THIRTY-THIRD ANNUAL MEETING

OF THE

ASSOCIATION OF

Directors of the Poor and Charities

OF THE

STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA

HELD IN THE

COURT HOUSE, AT MEADVILLE, PENNA.,

October 8, 9 and 10, 1907.

The Thirty-Third Annual Convention of the Association of Directors of the Poor and Charities of the State of Pennsylvania, met at the court house, Meadville, Penn'a., on Tuesday morning October 8th, 1907, at 10:15 a. m. as per program, and after some thirty minutes spent in registering and greetings the President, Dr. J. Lewis Srodes, of Woodville, Pa., called the convention to order.

Rev. Dr. B. B. Ferer, Pastor of St. Paul's Reformed Church, of Meadville, conducted the devotional exercises, reading the 103d Psalm, and offering prayer, while the delegates rose to their feet.

Mr. Whitney Braymer, of Meadville, apologized to the Association for the absence of music at the morning session, saying that it was through a misunderstanding that there was to be no music at the first session, and said:

In behalf of the citizens of Meadville and of this county I wish to introduce to you the Hon. Arthur L. Bates, member of Congress from the 26th Congressional District.

Mr. Bates was received with applause, and spoke as follows:

ADDRESS OF WELCOME.

Mr. President and Members of the Pennsylvania Association of Directors of the Poor and Charities:

In behalf of his honor, Mayor Reitze, and all the people of this city, I extend to you a hearty welcome to Meadville. Let me express the hope that after your sojourn in this place, you will depart with pleasant recollections of Meadville, as I know you will with added enthusiasm for the work which you have met here to promote.

I notice from the program that a goodly number of eminent speakers and thinkers are to address you this week on the various topics suggested by a convention in behalf of public charities. In the great number of subjects I see: "Poor House Management," the "Blind School," "Treatment of the Harmless Insane," "Childhood and Old Age," "Child Labor," the "Relief of Needy Families," "Juvenile Court." In these and all the other topics for your discussion during your three days' meeting I notice that one sentiment, one great teaching pervades them all, and that is the truth laid down by Him who taught as never man taught, that the strong should help the weak or "bear ye one another's burdens and so fulfill the law of Christ."

I congratulate you therefore that you are engaged in this noble work. You are dominated, I take it, by the spirit of helpfulness. And this is true whether you are engaged in these labors from individual and personal interests or whether as public servants. I believe that you all recognize the fact that the spiritual, the sentimental means more in a state or nation than the material.

The great Napoleon said that the moral force, the moral effect counted over the material in war as 10 to 1. How much more should it count in peaceful pursuits, in civil and social life.

We can congratulate ourselves here in Pennsylvania that our people have thrift, business energy, business enterprise and all that springs from them, as the foundation upon which to build our superstructure. In no place more than in our state has history seen better the expressive growth of man. The spirit of freedom was never stronger than here. Our diversity of employment is prodigious. We have raw material and we have finished products. We have agriculture, timber, textiles, oil, coal, iron and steel. The products of these are the principal results of Pennsylvania's effort. The industrial population of Pennsylvania deserves to be studied as a specimen. The well springs of prosperity run full but do not overflow. I need not go into figures. The reports from factory and farm and mine and the busy marts of trade all prove that the people of Pennsylvania were never so prosperous as now, that never were so many of our people engaged in pursuits which bring them profitable returns, and never before enjoying all of the necessities and many of the comforts and luxuries of life.

I rode by an old farm house on a country road the other day. I remembered how in the old days gone by the aged, the unfortunate, those mentally deficient were shut up oftentimes in the garrets of the farm houses with little care or attention, almost left to die alone, and it is said in some instances they were even tied or chained. I am thankful with you that there are no such blots on our social life today. That we have, through public and private charity, homes, resorts, retreats, asylums, hospitals, where the poor, the aged, the unfortunate, can have good shelter, sufficient clothing, abundant food, and better than all, kind treatment and medical and other attention, so that misery and suffering is reduced to the minimum. This we are enabled to do and accomplish because we have the material means for bringing it about and what is just as important, the disposition to care for the unfortunate and make life and the living of it less difficult for others. Again I assure you of a most hearty welcome to this city. The good people of Meadville and Pennsylvania are applauding your efforts. They will, I promise you, hold up your hands and in your labors to care for the fallen ones and to protect and succor the weak, they will extend to you not only a God speed, but will gladly give you aid, encouragement and means for carrying on your work.

Mr. Whitney Braymer, of Meadville: Now on behalf of the Children's Aid Society of Meadville I will introduce Miss Margaret B. Power, who will deliver the address of welcome on behalf of the Children's Aid.

Miss Power was received with applause and said:

ADDRESS OF MISS POWER.

Friends and Co-Workers From Beyond Our Gates:

We cordially welcome you on this your first official visit to us, and trust this assembling may be productive of the best results, not only to those in whose behalf it is called, but also to ourselves in bringing out what is best and most unselfish in each one of us. The objects of these meetings are purely humanitarian, and as such merit the kindly consideration of all. Sociological questions are each year becoming more important. Literary people have awakened to this fact, several authors of recent years devoting much time to the "submerged tenth." This is an encouraging sign of the times, for when people's minds and hearts are aroused to the needs of the unfortunate there is surely hope that something will be done for them. If it is true that one should love his neighbor as himself, neighbor meaning anyone with whom he comes in contact, then indeed how to make life more tolerable for the helpless and miserable would seem to be the work in which all should engage. In Riis' book, "How the Other Half Lives," a terrible arraignment is made of the owners of unsanitary, dilapidated tenement houses where it is practically impossible for the tenants to live decent lives. In the larger cities this question is being partially met with the construction of better buildings with more light, air and possibilities of privacy for each family. "Wyckoff's Workers" is another book written by a Princeton professor who entered the army of laborers to convince himself of the truth of reports as to their condition. The attention of philanthropists also is directed to this matter and where formerly the superfluous funds of the wealthy were often used to build costly mausoleums for themselves and families they now take the form of some educational or charitable institution. The problems confronting those who have the care of the poor are legion and often difficult of solution. Gradually, however, we are taking saner views of the situation, realizing the best way to help them is to make them self-supporting, which is but another name for self-respecting. Of course this does not apply to the aged, crippled or feeble-minded. With these the only thing possible is to make their pitiful lives more comfortable. In our own country we happily do not see such destitution as prevails in many parts of the old world. Russia, for example, with millions of peasants borne down under the weight of generations of poverty. England, the powerful nation on whose possessions "the sun never sets," has many thousands of unemployed, for which the "Queen's Fund" has been started to alleviate the distress occasioned by lack of work. With our country the refuge of the poor of other lands it becomes us to prevent the conditions which disgrace the older civilizations. How to assimilate this vast army of aliens is occupying the thoughts of some of the greatest minds today. As Dr. Gladden has well said, "It is a work the very heart of which is friendship. It is essentially a work of redemption and calls for love, service and sacrifice." We feel that the efforts of the C. A. S. should appeal to every heart. The fact that a little one is left desolate; denied the love which should be the birthright of every child, often suffering from cruelty or destitution is sufficient in most cases to secure generous provision for it, at least temporarily. Many a grumpy "scrooge" who absolutely denies help to adults, no matter how deserving, relents in the case of a needy child. Our society refuses aid to none and when it becomes generally known that it is organized for the purpose of assisting poor mothers to rear their children aright and to give neglected children the care and education they must have to become good men and women we are certain that we shall not have to abandon this work. The C. A. S. discourages child labor and earnestly strives to prevent any employment of children which interferes with regular attendance at school. It finds good homes for those who have none and in this connection it may be well to give the views of Dr. Bomordo, who has probably had more experience with friendless waifs than any other person in the United States. He says that environment counts for a great deal more than heredity, which will be good news to those who have hesitated to take a child on account of undesirable parentage. They may now feel that their training will have more effect on the child's character than inherited traits. To conclude this paper I know of nothing better than the words of Coleridge:

O'er wayward childhood wouldst thou hold firm rule
And sun thee in the light of happy faces;
Love, Hope and Patience, these must be thy graces,
And in thine own heart let them first keep school.

Mr. W. O. Nichols, of Franklin, was called upon by President Srodes, but was not present.

President Srodes: I can only inform the citizens of Meadville that such a failure does not mean failure to us. We always have with us a man on whom we can depend to respond to the most generous welcome. I introduce to you our Secretary, Mr. L. C Colborn, who will respond to the address of welcome.

Mr. Colborn was received with applause and responded as follows:

ADDRESS OF SECRETARY COLBORN.

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen, and Members of the Association:

It certainly affords me pleasure on behalf of this Association to respond to Mr. Bates, and thank him and the good citizens of Meadville for this very eloquent and cordial welcome to your city. Indeed, we feel flattered over this very high enconium pronounced upon us and the work we are engaged. I fear that when we have finished our labors—, you may feel like saying, "depart in peace," but don't come back any more.

I trust, however, that we shall all so conduct ourselves, within your gates, that the influence and remembrance of this convention may be good, and win for us at all times, a warm welcome from you.

Strange as it may seem to you, the position I now occupy is em-embarrassing to me. By reference to the program, you will see that W O. Nichols was to respond to this address of welcome. Well, my name is not Nicklas, although my great-grandfather's was. For this affliction you have to credit our worthy President and the Chairman of the Program Committee, Mr. Whitney Braymer. For at a meeting of the committee at Woodville, both said that they would hold me responsible for all delinquencies and would expect me to take their place. Well, I am neither an unabridged dictionary, an encyclopedia or a university, and therefore notice is hereby given that I will not be held responsible for the delinquents on the program, but will turn them over to Brother Fuller, as Probation Officer, to take charge of the subjects. I want to assure you I am glad to be here and to see so many familiar faces present as well as the goodly number of new ones.

From the life-giving springs and fountains around this beautiful city you would think that the citizens tarried very long in life. In reply to the question put to Mr. Braymer, "if the people of this vicinity often died," he said, "No; only once." He told me in confidence that he feared that a great many of the people would have to be killed in order to be resurrected in the last day. Be that as it may, the delightful welcome we have received, the impressions of your beautiful city, with its nicely paved streets, splendid business houses, beautiful and comfortable homes, gives all the desire to stay with you, and in addition to this, it is one of the seats of learning, Allegheny College having been established here, from which her light and wisdom through her graduates has penetrated to even the remotest parts of the state and country, thus being a benefactor in the educational world. Here, too, are located homes for friendless children, and the first home for the care of orphans of Odd Fellows. So that your philanthropy and charity have been in keeping with the growth of your city. You can therefore justly feel proud of your city.

This is the thirty-third anniversary of the association. The incalculable good it has done for the state and for mankind in the third of a century is an incentive to the members to greater efforts, and justifies all in the time and money expended attending its meetings. Pennsylvania is certainly famous for its charities. I believe it ranks foremost of all the states. This association represents the great and varied body of charitable institutions which is the pride and glory of this great commonwealth for years.

There is not an ill that flesh is heir to, there is not a weakness nor infirmity known to human nature, for which ample provision for relief is not made with rich profusion by its citizens. Money with lavish hand has been appropriated for the care of her unfortunate afflicted, sick and poor citizens. Having now erected, equipped and running 590 institutions representing a total cost of over fourteen billions of dollars, and annually an outlay of over three millions of dollars. But lavish as is the expenditure of money for charity, Pennsylvania does not claim a monopoly of the wise administration of charity, nor presume that its own methods in distributing it have reached perfection. We have much to learn, and I know of no source from which we can so well learn it as from the gathering of the wise and experienced persons who have made it a study, and who are members of this association, where at each convention develop new methods, new ideas and new hopes for the future.

For thirty years all the reform movements in our hospitals and poor houses have eminated from this association. For more than twenty-five years all the legislation that has been enacted on our statute books in the interest and welfare of the poor and our institutions have been first moulded, endorsed, advocated and recommended by this association, while in return we have not received the recognition from those in authority we justly deserve.

But as we grow in numbers, in influence and in strength, the reward will come, for as surely as the "cups of cold water and boxes of ointment" received their reward, so shall the work of the good Samaritans of this association receive a just recompense of reward.

In some of the beautiful legends of the Middle Ages, you will find examples in which the good Samaritan finds by the way-side in some abandoned spot a poor leper afflicted with the dreadful disease which was then a scourge in Europe, you will read, "that the good Samaritan, taking pity on him, conveys him to his home, dresses his wounds, lavishes on him every comfort and every attention that loving ingenuity could bestow; and then the features of the sick man became suddenly glorified and revealed in the person of the leper the glorious Savior of Mankind."

Such legends are very numerous in the lives of many present day saints, members of this Association, surely they will receive their reward. But I am digressing from my subject.

The purpose of these annual meetings have been so thoroughly demonstrated, and the benefits so greatly realized, that it is not necessary for me to speak of it.

"Carlyle tells us that the best material for a pair of friends is two persons with different opinions, but identical in sentiment;" this is the secret of this association in whch we are knit, for nowhere can we find wider differences of opinion among thoughtful, intelligent people than we find here, and no where do you find such unanimity of sentiment as we enjoy toward the many weak ones, and erring, suffering humanity, with whose errors, misfortunes and defects we are chiefly concerned. If we had no other purpose than that as the Apostle Paul says, "to provoke one another to love and good works," we would be repaid for the time and expense of attending these meetings, and the state be benefited.

Our lamented deceased brother and zealous member, Lewis Pew, of Scranton, once said in an address before this association that the purpose and object of this association was, "to reduce the tuition fees in the school of experience." This puts the object and purpose of this association in a nut shell.

But higher and greater than this is to cultivate and diffuse throughout the commonweath a noble sentiment towards the host of people whose misfortunes have brought them to our knowledge, and to teach us how to think and feel towards our poor, unfortunate and afflicted fellow citizens, as well as to better care and provide for them. These are some of the objects of this association.

And now, Mr. Bates, you have extended to us the freedom of your city, you have welcomed us to your hearts and your homes, I trust the privileges so cordially extended to us may not be abused, but that our meeting with you may be of mutual interest and profit to all. You and all your citizens are invited to our meetings and to join in our discussions and proceedings, give to this association the inspiration of your presence and the wisdom of your counsel, so that when our labors are ended and we shall return to our several homes we may take with us the most kindly recollections of your city, and that the influence that may be diffused, will linger long and bring forth fruit even to a hundred fold.

Again in behalf of the members of this association, I thank you for the very cordial welcome to your city.

President Srodes: Mrs. J. L. Anderson, of Allegheny, is not present this morning. She was on the program to respond to the address of welcome on the part of Children's Aid Society. I will ask Mrs. J. H. Evans, of Oil City, to respond to that address in place of Mrs. Anderson.

Mrs. Evans was received with applause and responded as follows, saying as a preface: "I am not Mrs. Anderson, and it might be as well to omit the applause."

RESPONSE OF MRS. J. H. EVANS.

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen of the Convention:

On behalf of the Children's Aid Society we accept with pleasure the kindly greeting extended by Miss Power.

It recalls a similar occasion a few years ago, when the Children's Aid Society of Western Pennsylvania, at their annual meeting, was cordially welcomed and graciously entertained by the auxiliary of this city.

Most of you here today are familiar with the work of our organization, so I will not consume the time with details. We feel, however, that among all the various charities of our state, this work stands pre-eminent. Caring for the needy homeless and dependent children, many of whom have been deserted by one parent, some by both, and endeavoring to place them in families where they will receive kind, careful, judicious training, be educated in the public school, be sent to church and school, taught habits of industry and thus trained up to become useful and law-abiding citizens. I firmly believe that the value of childhood has increased since the work of our organization has become more fully understood. No more important subject can claim the attention of any citizen than the proper rearing of the children of the state, especially those who have been deprived of loving home care and training, which is the right of every child.

Am sure we shall all be greatly interested in the many good things that will come before us along this and other lines.

Again we thank you for your cordial welcome to this beautiful city, with its many educational institutions, brilliant women and distinguished men.

President Srodes: Mrs. Evans said she wanted us to understand that she was not Mrs. Anderson. It reminds me of a story of the colored man who was arrested in Virginia on the charge of making moonshine whiskey. When he was called before the bar his name was called out and it proved to be Joshua Wright. As he approached the bar the judge asked him what his name was and he said, "Your Honah, Joshua Wright." The judge said: "Joshua, Joshua, are you the Joshua that made the sun stand still?" "No, your Honah," he replied, "I isn't de Joshua who made de sun stand still. I is de Joshua who made de moon shine." (Laughter.) Mrs. Evans isn't Mrs. Anderson, but she is here with the address.

Now the next on the program is the Annual Afflic——the Annual Address by the President.

President Srodes addressed the convention as follows:

PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

Ladies and Gentlemen, Members of the Association and Citizens of Meadville:

At certain stated periods of time the currents of human thought converge toward some focal point so that for the time being the whole force of intellectual power is brought to bear upon some problem paramount at the moment in interest and importance to mankind. And though at such times we find much of the wreckage of exploded theories and intenable propositions cast upon the coasts of learning, these periods illustrate the conversation of intellectual power and bring about the high tides of humanity.

This particular period of time is claiming the attention of the representatives from separate communities in the State of Pennsylvania in an effort to advance the cause of charity and better the condition of our insane.

The honor of your choice at the last annual meeting held at Warren to preside over your deliberations is highly appreciated and I have entered on the performance of the duties this honor entails with a consciousness that I am dependent on your kind assistance for the proper execution of the functions of the chair.

According to common usage, the annual address would be a retrospect of the work of this association for the year just passed and the opportunity presented by this occasion for a brain storm is almost too good to be missed, but a glance at the program for this meeting would indicate a spell of brain stormy topics, consequently, I will briefly dwell on the main features of this progressive work of practical philanthropy. No better example than this is spread upon the pages of history, of pure and unselfish labor of love, and no single line progress, through these years, marks with such precision the gradual evolution of the higher faculties of the human mind and heart.

To go back a century or two in England, the heart sickening description of the treatment of the insane at that period is almost beyond belief and it is surprising that extermination itself was not put in practice rather than subject these pitiable creatures to the tortures of their living death. The whipping post, the pillory and stocks, the ducking stool, the witches bridle and other equally barbarous customs were practiced then so abhorrent that both space and inclination deter one from attempting to describe.

In 1792 Dr. William Tuke began his work of ameliorating the condition of the insane. This was followed by Pinel's mission in France, but no law was enacted that in any way guarded the interests of the insane poor until 1808. In America the gradual march of improvement has followed in the wake of civilization. Scientific research and a higher religious intelligence have by degrees wrought a change toward our insane neighbor. He is no longer out from human habitations as unclean or a thing accursed, but to be cared for as an invalid deserving of the best medical skill and treatment and one whose affliction touches the tenderest chords of human sympathy.

To Philadelphia belongs the distinction of having made the first provision for the insane in America in establishing the Pennsylvania Hospital in 1751. A separate insane department of this hospital located in West Philadelphia was opened in 1841, under the able management of the late Dr. Kirkbride. In 1817 the Friends Asylum began its career of usefulness. The revision of our laws from time to time has brought us abreast with the age and we can now invite comparison with the most liberal measures either in this country or abroad. The advance in the care of the insane has kept pace with the socialistic evolution of modern society. It must be remembered that we have to compare the present condition of the mass of the population not with their state under some ideal organization of society, but with their actual condition in the past.

Reports from all the hospitals for the insane show a rapid progression of every line of work: First—The advance in hospital construction assuring the greatest amount of comfort and advantage in custodial care with the happiest means of classification. Second—

The increase in the medical service. Many institutions now have well equipped departments of pathology, gynecology and ophthalmology. Third—The organization of schools of nursing with a vast improvement in the character and intelligence of the attendants upon the insane. Fourth—the erection of a hospital for the chronic insane and the possibility in the near future of a separate institution for the criminal insane.

From the ruins of our mad houses and the remains of our poor houses have arisen hospitals and from these hospitals step by step our safeguards from diphtheria, appendicitis, smallpox and an innumerable host of surgical afflictions that so often in the past robbed our communities and homes of their brightest and their best. And our duty as directors, trustees, superintendents and citizens lies in the direction of providing our institutions with facilities for historical and pathalogical research. Let us in our treatment of our insane apply those principles that have brought such brilliant results in the treatment of other diseases. Let us bend our energies toward the prevention of insanity by placing in our hospitals for the insane the methods and men to ascertain how to do it. Insanity and tuberculosis will yield to future Carrolls, Lazears or Reeds just as yellow fever has yielded to their most noble sacrifice in the recent past.

Our charities of the future are no exception. I refer particularly to what is done in the name of charity. Charity as it is ordinarily understood is insufficient and temporizes with the real difficulty. The charity enjoined by scripture is charity of mind and disposition rather than physical charity. "Charity covereth a multitude of sins," but it does not cover a multitude of dirt. Much of the physical charity of today is but the individual or corporate atonements for the shortcomings of the community. The best physical charity is the establishment and enforcement of proper sanitary laws. Thus it will be seen that the priciples of preventive medicine apply universally. All are interested in them, no matter what our calling. Physicians are the natural agents of preventive medicine, but there are other natural agents; sanitary engineers expert in sanitary work, lawyers who have sanitary wisdom, philanthropists, sometimes misguided in their efforts, but helpful, the clergy and the religious denominations and by no means the least of these, the members of the Association of the Directors of the Poor and Charities of the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

The administration of our charities must broaden and progress. Poverty and insanity are the fruits of immoderate living, and as we improve the conditions of the poor and control those conditions which tend to insanity, we remove the cause of both. I can give no better illustration of what may be accomplished by persistent effort for the public good than the wonderful advance in the science of medicine within the recollection of most of our members. The revelations of the bacteriologist of yesterday has only prepared us for the wonders of tomorrow and the tireless questioner in the laboratory demands of each insidious disease its hidden cause and remedy. Nothing that contributes to human life and happiness escapes this new conqueror. The mountain brook making its way seaward is interrogated as to its hidden dangers. The dust that quivers in the sunlight yields up its poison; even the cup that symbolizes Christian faith and fellowship has been challenged as a foe.

It is therefore an era unique and unprecedented for research and investigation in the direction of the cause and prevention of disease and poverty and at first glance we might claim that the health problem is no longer a problem but one of the proven verities of cause and effect requiring only the judicious handling of the influences entering into the causes to control it for the public good. (Applause.)

President Srodes: Dr. Barchfield will not be here until this afternoon. We will continue his address until the afternoon session.

Mr. Frederick Fuller, of Scranton, moved that the chair now appoint the various committees and name them at the opening of the afternoon session.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. L. C. Colborn: I don't know whether it is known that the citizens of Meadville are cordially invited to come in and participate in the proceedings of this convention. We most cordially extend an invitation to everyone. I want to say that Congressman Barchfield will speak to us this afternoon. I know his address will be full of good things. Tomorrow evening Alexander Johnson, possibly the best authority on charities in the United States, will speak to us, and his addresses are always interesting. And Mr. Nibecker will speak to us also. We would be glad to have this house filled with the good people of Meadville at that time.

Mrs. E. S. Lindsey, of Warren: I move that the Secretary be instructed to put notices in the evening papers to that effect. I want to say in regard to Mr. Nibecker that the address he delivered in Warren was received with intense interest and aroused an interest that people had never felt before in that city. I think on behalf of Mr. Nibecker we should make an effort to have him appreciate his audience.

Col. E. P. Gould, Erie: I move as an amendment to that that the representatives of the press be requested to place a notice in their papers in regard to the address of Mr. Nibecker tomorrow evening. That they ask the people of Meadville to attend the meeting.

The amendment of Col. Gould is adopted.

President: I would ask the members who are on the program to notify the Secretary so that we can be informed whether they will respond according to the program or not.

Upon motion the convention was here adjourned until two o'clock this afternoon.

Farewell to Summer, (violin obligato); Johnson—Harry Waithe Manville.

Mrs. Arthur V. Leberman, accompanist.

Pittsburg, Pa., Oct. 8, 1907.

Dr. J. L. Srodes: Directors' Convention, Meadville, Pa.

Circumstances over which I have no control as congressman and county chairman prevent my being with you this morning. I wish you and your organization every success and know your deliberations will enure to the benefit of all the people under your control.

(Signed) A. J. Barchfield.

Patrick Boyle, Esq., member Board of Public Charities, Oil City, Pa., who was to have delivered an address at this hour, not being present the further business of the Convention was proceeded with.

Miss Elizabeth Kerr, Philadelphia, read the following interesting paper, which was warmly applauded.

Social Problems of the 19th Century.

It would be an act of temerity to attempt more than a resume of "The Social Reforms of the 19th Century" in the necessary limited time allotted this paper. I shall therefore touch only lightly upon some of the splendid movements in the direction of reform having as their incentive the bettering of the moral physical and mental condition of our child and adult neighbor. Charity is ever going forward and has made wonderful strides in the last few years. The past three decades have witnessed the birth and rapid development of that system of relief familiarly known as the "Charity Organization," which is doing most effective work in all our large cities.

To this society perhaps more than any other is the credit due for our schools of philanthropy. The conviction is steadily growing in the minds of all thinking people that the Charity worker must be trained to as high a level of efficiency as the worker of any profession. The care and treatment of the insane is receiving the attention of our most scientific, intelligent and humane authorities. Immigration involving as it does such questions as local and federal supervision, the care of the alien paupers, foreign contract laborers and etc., has become a matter of deep personal interest to us, for in many instances the new arrival is physically and morally unfit to make a good citizen; nevertheless we feel confident that by patience and study we will be able to cope with the difficulty and solve this most trying problem. The fight against the great White Plague—Tuberculosis—is being carried on with ever increasing zeal and it is well that the world should be fully aroused on this question since this dread disease carries off one-tenth of our population and causes more poverty than any other. Reforms tending to the health, happiness, progress and usefulness of the people are most encouraging signs of the upward and onward movement. Prison reforms where volunteer probation officers have charge of individual cases. School visiting under the Public Education Association—Family visiting under the Charity Organization, Building Inspection, Pure Food Laws—these for our adult neighbor.

It is however in child saving work that such tremendous strides have been made, perhaps because this is the hopeful side of the plan. The vigorous campaign for the enforcement of child labor laws has produced gratifying results. It has stirred the whole community, in fact the whole country, for its aim to prevent the helpless child from working when he should be nourished and be increasing his store of knowledge and wisdom, is bound in time to bias public sentiment in its favor.

The Anti-Cigarette Law. Compulsory Education, Night Schools, Manual Training Schools, Public Kindergartens, Public Baths, Public Playgrounds, Gymnasiums, Settlements, Clubs for Boys and Girls, Mothers' Clubs, the removal of Children from Almshouses, the Societies to protect Children from Cruelty, Childrens' Aid Societies for the care and training of dependent and delinquent children in private families, the Juvenile Courts, the Houses of Detention for our Minor delinquents—these are some of the results we are able to get our uplift from. In large cities it has been found practicable to bring childrens' cases to a special court where the Judges give careful study and consideration to each case.

The wisdom of this reform has met the approval of the most intelligent people in our great cities. Frequently when children are kindly admonished and put on their honor they respond to the better suggestion. The universal awakening to the vital importance of the welfare of the children of every nation is the best encouragment to work which has limitless possibilities and divine inspiration.

The discussion "Poor House Management," fixed for this hour was abandoned for the present, owing to the absence of Mr. David Garret and others who were on the program to open the discussion.

President Srodes suggested that discussion take place on some subject, the one on the program or some subject to be selected and called on Dr. P. J. Nichol of Chester, but he being absent the President called on Mr. H. W. Ochse, of Allegheny.

Mr. Ochse: I am not prepared to speak on the subject.

President Srodes: I will call upon Col. Gould of Erie.

Col. E. P. Gould: Some men can talk more learnedly on what they don't know than on what they do know. I haven't been inside of an almshouse for some years, in the real work, and I cannot give any very learned discussion on the subject, and before experts I would be reluctant to say what I think about how an almshouse ought to be run. I think a substitute is better than the original, sometimes. I have an old friend here, I don't care what subject he takes, I am going to ask you to call upon Dr. Flood.

The President calls upon Dr. Flood.

Dr. Flood: Mr. Chairman, I would like to know, first what you would like to have me talk about. The first subject you announced is one I have taken some interest in.

The subject of poor house management is one of the greatest questions that can be brought to the attention of a body of men and women who are so deeply interested in the welfare of the unfortunate as you are.

I have made a study of the management of the poor in poor houses from the standpoint of the poor house in Crawford County. There is one point in the management of the poor in poor houses that I think is, as a rule, overlooked, and yet it is the underlying question in all that management today that needs attention most; and that is the point where a sane man or a sane woman taken to a poor house may be made an idiot, an imbecile, by being placed in part or in whole under the care of idiots or the insane or imbeciles in county houses. Your county homes in other counties than Crawford must be very much better managed than ours has been—and ours has been well managed—we have good and true men in charge of our county house; men whose hearts sympathize with the poor and needy; but I tell you it is my candid conviction that there are a great many counties in the state and in other commonwealths in the Union, where the people are responsible for converting sane men and sane women into idiots and imbeciles, and it is a curse that is resting under God, on the men and women who are responsible for that thing being done.

It is hardly possible to place an imbecile or an idiot in charge of a sound mind, or of men and women who have sound minds, and lift that person up to a plane where they have a sound mind. You may do it in an insane asylum where you have physicians in charge of them who are specialists: It is often a disease of the nerves; but in county houses you will find the rule working the other way: That the imbeciles and the feeble minded will drag the sane down to their level, rather than the sane the others up to their level. I know of several cases where it can be demonstrated that it has worked exactly as I indicate: that the sane have been carried down and not the weak minded lifted up.

Now if that be true it makes one of the vital questions for discussion in a convention like this, and there can be but one remedy for that trouble and that is to segregate the weak minded and the imbeciles and place them in charge of keepers who will take good care of them, but not an old man or old woman who have become discouraged in life by the loss of friends and property, where that fact so discourages and unnerves them for the battle of life that they drop to the level of the imbeciles at their side. I say segregate them: and if that be done I believe that instead of as at Warren where we have some ten or twelve hundred insane (and we have now about ten such asylums in the state) that we would need about one for every two or three counties in the state: then we would reach the ideal of civilization that should prevail among us as a civilized and Christian people, but until we came there there will always be a cloud on our claim of being of the highest type of civilization, and the highest type of christianized men and women.

As long as we allow men and women in our houses of charity to be dragged down to the level of imbeciles and weak minded men and women there is a stain upon our claim to the highest civilization.

If I had the power I would stir up this convention to talk hard and strong things until we were awake to take hold of this matter as it ought to be taken hold of and improve the conditions in every county.

We have made rapid strides in Crawford county, where like the good old fashioned stiff-backed Presbyterians, we believe in the perseverance of the saints, on that question.

Applause.

J. M. Stauffer (Hazelton): This is a very important question to me. I have been looking carefully at the management of perhaps half a dozen poor houses and I find that as a rule they have a farm of three or four hundred acres, and at the head of the management is an excellent farmer. Now to me that is a serious mistake. I think at the head of an institution of that kind we ought to have a professional man: someone who can care for these people: if necessary have a farmer under his management, and a teamster under the farmer's management, and have a seamstress and a butcher, and everything of that kind: but it seems to me that at the head of the management of a poor house should be a physician. I wonder how many poor houses in the state of Pennsylvania are managed by a physician who understands his business? I know of none.

President Srodes: I would like to hear from others on this question. Here is the time to talk about it.

Mr. Smith (Erie): I was surprised at Dr. Flood saying that there were poor houses where the imbeciles were given charge of the inmates. I don't think that takes place in Erie county. We don't expect weak minded people to have any authority at all, with us. It may be there are some such but I don't know anything about it. We don't have a doctor at the head of the poor house management there: but we have a man we think is very capable and we have a farmer under him and an assistant farmer under him. We have a professional butcher and a professional baker and try to keep things as nearly perfect as we can. We don't expect to reach perfection for sometime yet. We think we are on the right road, and we want to learn all we can here.

Charles Snyder (Philadelphia): This is a question we all ought to take an interest in. I have been connected with a public institution for some fifty years and have had a good deal to do with the insane and I find that very few if any have come back to do any good to themselves or their friends. The city of Philadelphia has purchased almost a thousand acres of farmland in the northern part of Philadelphia,—some twenty-five or thirty farms and farm buildings —and the object is to move the Philadelphia almshouse to that location—the insane department of that asylum. Last summer they moved a large number of the insane with their keepers into the farm houses, to do the work. They have gathered all the crops on the farms by the labor of the insane, and they seem to be happy and contented. They take an interest in the work and forget a large part of their troubles. That is an interesting point: not to confine these people, as you see in Norristown, thousands I might say under one roof, but take them into the country and get them interested in work. I am satisfied that will be a great step for good.

Applause.

Col. Gould: From year to year at the close of our conventions members have come to me, especially directors of the poor, and stewards, and said they came particularly to get new ideas in regard to the management of their institutions and they go away disappointed. There has been too much of the formal reading of papers and too little discussion of the real workings of charity.

Very few of us realize the situation of Pennsylvania in regard to the poor districts. There are some twenty counties that have county districts: in which we have poor directors elected as such, and county commissioners to perform the other duties of the county. And there is about the same number where the county commissioners are ex-officio directors of the poor. And nearly as many counties that are made up of single poor districts, and every township a poor district, and some counties where they have almshouses and poor districts, from one to several, in the county. That is the case in Lycoming county for instance. Take Lackawanna county: the city of Scranton has a magnificent poor district. Nearly all these districts are regulated by local and special laws, and we have that to contend with when we try to manage things in this convention and for years we have been struggling to make county districts all over the state and to bring them all under one general law, then if there is any fault with that law it can be amended. But today let any bill be introduced in the Legislature to reform the poor management and every county that is under the township system and the overseer system will fight it, and the members of the legislature dare not vote for it. Take the county of Centre. There is a county that stands as a bulwark against any legislation on this subject. There is one township in that county where there is not a poor man in the township. It used to be a mining district, and in another township there are so many poor, and in others there are no poor: and they have banded together in the townships that have no poor, so that the townships that are filled with poor people have to support their own poor, and those filled with rich people refuse to pay a cent for their support. That county stands as a bulwark against the county plan. You don't realize the difficulty that this association and the members coming from the different counties have to contend with when they come here and try to advance the system of public charities in the state. It cannot be properly done until we get a uniform system of poor laws. Let us fight together for county poor districts and county management of the poor and then we can improve our system.

A Voice: Do they issue any licenses in that county you spoke of, in the poor districts.

Col. Gould: I can't tell you. I got these facts from Governor Hastings.

Fred Fuller (Scranton): Mr. Gould has referred to the Hillside Home at Scranton. To me it is the greatest surprise in the world that it is possible that any poor district in Pennsylvania should so mix up their insane and sane patients with imbecile sand idiots. I can't comprehend it.

From my standpoint it is a crime. We have no such system at the Hillside Home. The Judge selects the very best men (I am one of the seven). (Laughter and applause)

Mr. Beemer is on this program for this speech. I wish he were here. He is one of the finest superintendents and managers of an insane asylum I know of. He is the best superintendent there is in the United States, I don't except anybody, anywhere. (Applause.) Our lamented Cadwalader Biddle said that Mr. Beemer was rarely equalled in the state of Pennsylvania, and never surpassed. And his wife is equal to him.

Our insane are kept entirely distinct from any other class, and they are classified and graduated. The epeleptics are by themselves, and a new building just erected at a cost of about $300,000 is entirely for the sane. I cannot understand how it is possible for any institution in this commonwealth to mix them up.

If there is any board doing that in this state let them stop it, and if they don't stop it let them be discharged. Mr. Beemer wished me to present his regards and respects. I wish he were here. He could tell you a great many things that a great many of you don't know anything about.

Applause.

Mr. Pohn: You have talked about almshouses and poor houses. I wish the time might come when they might be called county homes, or public homes. If a man or a woman has made the fight to earn a livelihood and has failed it is not true charity to put them in a place where they are branded as a pauper. Some counties publish their names, as receiving public benefit.

Another criticism you will permit me to make. Those who make the programs for these meetings ought to know before they put a person on the program that he or she are expected to be on hand. The meeting this afternoon has rather dragged. You have had to depend on the music and on our good friend Dr. Flood. If he hadn't been here we might be listening to the music yet. I would have an express promise from every one that they would be here. No one likes to be called up suddenly to talk on something they don't know anything about.

Mr. Colborn: I made out this program with the assistance of others, and every man named on the program and every woman was written to weeks before and an answer returned that he or she would be here to respond when their names were called.

Mr. Pohn: Then they ought to have public criticism.

Mr. Colborn: Death, sickness, etc., are legal excuses. Mr. Patrick Boyle expected to be here, but business of such importance that he could not get away prevented him. Congressman Barchfield had wired for rooms and expected to be here. A telegram just received says business over which he had no control prevented his coming. Now these things couldn't be foreseen by the program committee. They ought not to be censured when they assign a subject and the parties are prevented from coming by circumstances that they cannot avoid.

Now to the subject. I have been associated with the management of poor houses many years, as counsel, to the directors, etc. Years ago there were two great reforms started in the interest of the poor and insane. One was by Dorothy Dix of Massachusetts and we might attribute to her the reform movements that have spread over the land in regard to the care of the insane. This association was formed through the influence and spirit of that good woman. One of the hospitals of the state was named after her.

The other reform came through the Carys. Three years ago I attended the National Conference at Portland, Me., and stopped a day or two at Boston. I went to Concord, and of the places there and the homes of the renowned literary people and the other great ones none interested me more than the home of the Carys.

We remember the story of the Carys reform of the discipline in the schools, where the men who could wield the rod the strongest was the most successful teacher, where the reform was instituted that the teacher should be punished by the scholar. They laughed at him. He was a teacher himself. He opened his school. After two or three days a rough, burly boy came in, whose object was to have a good time and annoy everyone that he could. Good old man Cary told him that he had to be punished. He brought him out and gave him a ferrule and the old man held out his hand and says "strike." The boy's hand fell to his side and he says "I can't." He says "strike; this is the punishment inflicted upon you," and he brought the ruler down on the old man's hand. Age had made his hands tender, and the blood oozed out from it. The scholars were horrofied and shocked, tears came to their eyes. He held out his hand again and says, "strike again." The boy seeing what he had done says "I can't, I can't; you will have no further cause to punish me from this time on."

That was love. It was the love of the Carys that banished the brutal punishment out of school rooms, and on that principal we should govern all our institutions. It is upon that principle that we are meeting here today to devise means for the better care and management of our institutions. Let us show to these poor people that they are our brothers and sisters.

In answer to Dr. Nichols I would say that we have built schools for the feeble minded and idiotic, east and west: they should be removed there. We have institutions for the chronic and acute insane and they should be removed there, and when you have removed them there you will have a home for your poor which they may enjoy the balance of their days.

Applause.

Mr. Smith (Philadelphia): I cannot resist speaking on this subject. I have been associated with the care of the poor and insane for many years, and I believe our efforts in the care of the poor and the insane are largely misdirected. Some of you will agree with me: many will not. I don't think we fully realize the importance of selecting the very best men in the state as directors of the poor. We need to manage our institutions on a much higher plane than we have been managing them. The most important subject, I feel, has been overlooked.

For years we have been studying how to better the condition of our unfortunates. We have made great strides in that direction and their condition is much better than it was twenty years ago, but why not bend our efforts towards the betterment of our unfortunate population? If we put forth the proper effort we will revolutionize the present conditions. We are convinced from our experience that there is one cause that can be removed that is producing two-thirds of our insane people and more than three-fourths of our paupers. Now how shall we overcome the increase of this dependent class? Do you ask how we shall prevent it? Wipe out the liquor traffic. (Applause.) We will then have less than 25 per cent of the pauperism we have today and less than 40 per cent of the insane. Why should we permit a condition that brings about so much misery? Your sons and husbands and fathers and brothers, and I am sorry to say your wives, to a small extent, your sisters and daughters, are subject to this accursed traffic that is enriching a few and damning a great number, and not alone those that become paupers and insane but many who never sink to that low level. We have laws making merchants liable for selling impure articles of food: but the most impure and poisonous drug that can be sold as liquor is permitted to be sold without fear of the law. Why should we permit this?

Applause.

President Srodes: I would ask for a few remarks form Mr. Nibecker.

F. H. Nibecker (Philadelphia): I do not understand that if we should call the almshouses or the poor houses county hotels, or county resorts, or even call them by the names of the famous hotels of the large cities that they would be any less objectionable in the eyes of the sensitive poor, or any less sought for by the degraded poor, who are glad to be relieved of the responsibility of their lives and throw that responsibility on the public.

There is a great deal of sentimental nonsense, or as one person wise in all sociological work, behind me, suggests "rot," in regard to these matters. I do not believe because we call it any name that charity becomes any the less charity, and I do not believe that the unfortunate should begrudge the community the opportunity of being charitable to them, or try to deceive themselves into thinking that they are not accepting charity. It is the part of those who are fortunate in the world to be permitted to exercise the God-given right of kindness toward those who are unfortunate, and no poor man should deny others the right to assist him out of his difficulty or deny the township in which he has lived, and that has received the benefit of his work, the right of helping him out of his difficulty and of giving him charity. Love that is concreted in the shape of dollars is much more effective than the love that is concreted in mere words and sweet smiles. The latter kind is ready to be given by almost anyone; the former kind is love that depends upon actual interest and the fulfillment of actual obligations on the part of the giver. So I do not think there is any great merit in calling these institutions the county home, or the hillside resort, when it is really the almshouse. It is the county's charity to those who have given their lives to the county, and have come to be in a position where they must permit the county to give them something. I think it is hypersentimentalism, on the one hand, and from the other viewpoint I think it is vicious by any subterfuge to cover up the sweetest thing in the community's life, and that sweetest thing is charity. It is what keeps some people back on the earth when they would be very far below the earth if they were not called upon sometimes to come back and do for others. I believe we can claim the right—not that it is our obligation, as is the continual talk, that it is simply an obligation that people are afraid to accept—I think we can claim the right to be decent, to be substantially helpful, to the unfortunate part of humanity. If we can educate people to look at it in that way, instead of giving us the other unwholesome and heathenish interpretation, I am sure that when one is broken down by life's battles, having fought well and when his resources have been exhausted and energies depleted they will go, not with hesitation but as though they were simply allowing others to do for them what they would claim the right to do if they were in the reverse circumstances. No such sensitive person on the subject of receiving charity who is wholesomely sensitive but would, if it were in his power, have given of his resources to someone else. If so why hasn't someone else the right to give to him, and why hasn't he the right to accept it?

It is the other part of humanity that fill the almshouses that we should fight against and not be over-tender with. Those who are ever read to throw themselves upon the community: not only imposters but those who have so low an idea of their own manhood and obligations that they are always ready to throw themselves on the community. For them I think there should be something more unpleasant than working a beautiful farm in the open country, which almost any of us would welcome as a relief from the drudgery of the many duties of life.

No one has the right to deprive you and me of the pleasure and duty of being kind to those who need our kindness. (Applause.)

Mr. Pohn: I am not denying the right of people to call these homes by whatever name they please. It may be sentimental people who want this, but in my opinion it is more those who have over sentimentalism than no sentiment at all. If the gentleman has the experience with the poor that he says he has he knows there are many people who refuse to receive charity in a poor house under the name of the poor house or almshouse. It is not in harmony with the sentiment of the age to call them almshouses or poor houses. The latest institutions are not called such, as I understand it. In Allegheny county they call it the Allegheny County Home, and I think everyone will say that is a good name.

The gentleman says charity is one of the sweetest blessings to man, and if so let us make it charity without objectional features, so far as possible. There are many who refuse to accept outside county aid because it is published in the papers that they do so. It may be sentiment, but we must admire such a sentiment and I think the public is doing an unkindness when it allows the names of the worthy poor to be published as coming under the aid of public charity.

Mr. Colborn: An invitation has been extended to the members of the association to visit Allegheny College; also to visit Spencer Hospital, and we can take them both in this afternoon. Tonight the good people of Meadville will tender a reception to all visitors and members of the association, at the Unitarian Parish House at eight o'clock. We will have music and we want you all there to meet the people of Meadville, and I know you will all enjoy it.

It was my pleasure to visit the Conference of Charities and Corrections at Minneapolis. I there met Mr. Solenberger. I see him present here now. I take pleasure in introducing Mr. Solenberger, of Philadelphia, who is connected with the childrens' work there.

Mr. Solenberger: I am glad to be here for I feel like an old Pennsylvanian. As a Pennsylvania Dutchman I am glad to be among you and I trust that the work of caring for the children may be increasingly useful to the Directors of the Poor throughout the state.

Upon motion the convention was here adjourned until nine o'clock tomorrow morning.

On Tuesday evening October 8th a reception was tendered the members of the association at the Independent Congregational (Unitarian) Parish House, arranged by the local committee and the Childrens' Aid Society, which was greatly enjoyed by all the members, and gave an opportunity to meet many of the people of Meadville. A pleasing program of music and impromptu speeches, together with delicious refreshments, made it one of the pleasant occasions of the convention, and one of the most enjoyable of the events at any meeting of the association.

Dr. Flood, of Meadville, acted as chairman of the occasion, and after the members had assembled in the hall of the parish house he called upon different members present for remarks, and most happy remarks were made by Congressman Arthur L. Bates, Mrs. E. S. Lindsey, Mr. L. C. Colborn, Mr. Fred Fuller and Mr. Nibecker.

A delightful duett was rendered by Miss DeArment and Miss Bork, and solos by each of these ladies, at which Miss Mary Thorpe Graham acted as accompanist, and altogether the occasion was most enjoyable and reflected credit upon those who prepared it, as well as those who participated in the entertaining.

MORNING SESSION. Wednesday, October 9th.

The convention was called to order as per adjournment, by President Srodes.

Rev. William H. Fish, of the Independent Congregational Church (Unitarian) conducted Devotional exercises.

Following the devotional exercises the convention was entertained by a solo by Miss Rosalie Bork, who graciously responded to an encore.

After which Miss Thompson favored with a piano solo, and Mr. Lloyd Singley sang a number, which called for an encore, which he gave.

A motion was agreed to that when the convention adjourned at the close of the morning session they adjourn until this evening, to give the members opportunity to visit the county home in the afternoon. And it was agreed that the start should be made at two p. m.

REPORT OF THE SCHOOL FOR THE BLIND, AT PITTSBURG.

Mr. T. S. McAloney presented the following report on the School for the Blind, at Pittsburg:

I have been asked to make a report on this School. It is well known that more than one-third of the cases of blindness in the schools can be absolutely prevented. They are due to neglect and ignorance in the care and treatment of the eyes of the newly-born infant. Here comes our first duty to the blind. It is our duty to use every effort to prevent unnecessary blindness. This can be done by spreading information broadcast that blindness can be prevented and by warning the mothers of the danger of inflammation in the little baby's eyes, and to call a doctor as soon as possible. At the same time simple remedies can be suggested. The doctors ought to pay more attention to this point and impress on mothers the importance of caring for the eyes of the little ones. From an economical standpoint it is our duty to do all we can in saving the state from supporting the unnecessarily blind. It has been estimated that it costs the state over $10,000 to care for every blind person in their charge. The state of New York three years ago appointed a commission to examine into the needs and requirements of the blind, and much good has resulted therefrom. Societies have been formed in New York state for sending out information that blindness can be prevented, and suggesting certain remedies. We should do that in Pennsylvania. The American boy's fondness for explosives is also a great source of blindness. It is our duty to see that such laws are passed as will prohibit the sale of cannon and giant crackers. It takes years after the blind child arrives at school to make up for the lack of training the parents should have given him. It is the duty of parents to treat a blind child as they would any other child; let him learn to dress and undress himself and do little chores around the house. If the parents do not realize that duty the neighbors and physicians should tell them about it. Even when the blind child arrives at school age we do not always get them into our schools. Parents will not part with the child, and he remains from year to year at home and degenerates mentally, morally and physically, and if he comes into school at 15 to 17 years of age we can do very little for him. As citizens we should have a compulsory education law passed compelling those parents to send these little blind ones to school when they arrive at school age; and the members of this association can do much good in this line. Many blind children don't know anything about the schools of the state. It is the duty of all here to impress on the parents of blind children the importance of having them educated.

It is our duty when this child is sent to school to see that proper training is given to the hands, to make them useful, and that the proper physical training is given, that the body is developed, and above all to see that the child is taught some occupation or trade that will make him self-sustaining. The average citizen when he sees a blind man hands him a nickle or dime and feels that he has done his duty. No doubt his motive is good, but it is misdirected charity, and from our standpoint, as educators of the blind, we feel that he has done something wrong. We use every effort to teach them to be self-sustaining. When they go into the world they find that they have a hard battle to fight and they are encouraged to give up their efforts by this misdirected charity.

It is your duty to see that a blind person is given some suitable employment; that he is required to make an honest living. The blind person will be much happier and will have some self-esteem and respect.

There are many other duties we owe to the blind, but I will not refer to them now. Our school is in one of the prettiest parts of Pittsburg, near the Carnegie Music Hall, and the pupils have the advantage of hearing the music there. We have established a kindergarten department and the physical work has also received careful attention. We have systematic daily physical instruction. We have finished an athletic field, and hope this year to build a new gymnasium. We also pay attention to industrial work. A number of new trades have been opened to the blind, and good work is being done.

I wish to extend an invitation to you all to make a visit to our school. (Applause.)

Miss Edna Meeker read the following report of the Industrial School at Woods Run:

REPORT OF WOODS RUN INDUSTRIAL HOUSE, ALLEGHENY, PA.

It is the aim of the Woods Run Industrial House Association to broaden, deepen and make more spiritually beautiful the lives of the people of the district, and every means employed looks toward this end. The House is in friendly relationship with the various city departments, and has found them willing to co-operate in efforts made to benefit the neighborhood.

This association was originally a "relief" organization, but the commercial prosperity of the past two years has greatly reduced its responsibility along the line of material relief giving. Also, as heretofore, many coming for assistance are referred to the out-door department of the City Bureau of Charities, and thus the association is left practically free to do settlement work. The relief-giving is hardly more than a neighborly response to a call to help. Much that is given is in the form of a loan. However, the House has a workroom. There, on account of particular need, widows and others partially dependent, who can do hardly any work other than very plain sewing—some can only cut and sew rags for carpet—are given on an average one day's work a week. For this they receive sixty cents; not in cash, but credit for the amount is given at a grocery store, or, if it is so desired, the money will accumulate for them until there is enough to pay for shoes, clothing or a load of coal. Many of the garments made in the work room are sold, as are also second hand shoes, clothing and furniture, which are contributed by more prosperous friends, but some are given to the very needy.

Day's work for women and some employment for girls is secured, but it is seldom that a woman in the neighborhood is obliged to add to the family income unless her husband has died, or is temporarily out of employment. A little more than a year ago a dispensary was organized. It is opened three days a week at noon, a physician gives her services and the only charge made is ten cents for medicine. Some of our dispensary supplies are called into service very often—in season and out of season—for children and young people come to us to have a sore finger, cut foot or burn bandaged, and to get something for a toothache or a headache.

From the Bellevue branch of the Pittsburg and Allegheny Milk and Ice Association we received from May 18th, 1906, to April 1st, 1907, 9,923 quarts of milk for 148 sick and convalescent neighbors.

The sewing classes include instructions in needle work for little girls of nine years, to mothers who also are taught to cut garments. The total membership of last year's fifteen clubs and classes was about 164. The greatest accomplishment was that of a number of young women and girls who made shirt waists.

There were only two successful cooking classes for women and working girls during the past winter. Special equipment having made individual work possible, it was expected that the young women would be particularly interested, but they seemed to find it hard to concentrate their minds on anything that resembled work after being employed all day in factory or shop. Little girls are taught cooking in the public schools.

For some time past it has been my privilege to visit the stogie factory in the neighborhood, and I have given many informal talks to the girls during their luncheon period. There were special Christmas and Valentine parties in the House for these girls. The Friday Evening Club for these and other young women was organized last fall and, though the members have been provided with sewing, particular attention has been given to their mental and moral development through reading, talks and singing.

Five pupils are now enrolled for music lessons. There is a strong desire on the part of many of the neighbors to study the piano and before long it is hoped that other volunteer teachers will make more work along this line possible. During last winter the Children's Department of our library lent books to 89 persons. The librarian was greatly encouraged to find that at least 20 of these were enthusiastic about reading and were intelligent in their selection of books.

Quite recently a department for adults was added to the library work. Cards have been issued to 19 men and women. Most of the books issued on card are from the regular monthly and semi-monthly installments received from the Carnegie Library, but the House has a small library of its own which may be drawn upon. The books are often borrowed by those who have no library card; magazines are given away, and wherever it is known that there exists a desire for good reading, effort is made to meet it. In addition to this library work, two club leaders bring books to lend to their boys, and from which to read aloud to them. Other boys come to the House to read during the week. Young men come to look up material and to prepare for debates, and on Sundays boys and girls spend a part of the afternoon in reading books or looking at magazine pictures. Sunday evenings in the winter we have also a group of boys reading until 8:30 or 9 o'clock.

It is the custom to have hymn singing from 6:30 to 7:30 Sunday evenings, and a few boys or girls to supper.

The records for the fiscal year ending March 31st, 1907, show a total of 11,129 tub, shower and pool baths having been taken. This does not include the several hundred baths taken by boys and young men after work in the gymnasium.

Last winter there was a membership of about 125 in our eleven clubs having regular gymnasium work, but several scores of little boys had occasional instruction in gymnastics. While the tendency with some was to expend all surplus energy in physical exercises, we noticed with satisfaction that a few of the young men realized that time also should be given to mental improvement. One club of thirteen young men having one hour weekly in the gymnasium, spent another evening each week in transacting club business and in discussions and debates. The Young Citizen's Club, composed of young men over seventeen years of age, was organized in November, 1906, and from that time until summer weekly meetings were held, when the members often listened to addresses by prominent men of Allegheny and Pittsburg. At one meeting the members debated on the Immigration Question, and later discussed Negro Suffrage.

The Basketry Class last winter was composed of ten boys who did satisfactory work.

Crokinole and carroms boards are always in great demand. Checkers also is popular in the game room.

A few months ago a slight demand for games to be played at home evenings caused us to organize a game library. It is hoped that soon it will be more extensively used. A young girl who borrowed a game said on returning it, "Its fine. It keeps the boys home nights. Have you another one?"

A year ago the Friday evening service of singing and story-telling was divided, making a class for girls and one for boys. The arrangement resulted in larger attendance of boys—the girls' attendance always has been good.

Story telling has a prominent place in our entertainment of children, and usually one is told every week at the mothers' meeting. Particular attention is always given to the observance of holidays for the benefit and enjoyment of the young and old. Last Christmas 109 dinners were given the poor, and we received for distribution to children, from the Toy Mission, 424 packages. During the summers picnics are held for women, for boys, and others for girls, and there is usually a picnic given by the Salvation Army or Pittsburg Dispatch (this year there were both) to which invitations are given to the House for about 150 to 300 neighbors. Parties of women and children are sent each summer to the Glenfield and Fair Oaks Fresh Air Homes.

There were about 400 registered in regular clubs and classes last winter, but the House is always open to all who can be accommodated, and there are several hundreds who come more or less regularly to play, sing, read, dance or swim, or to see the swimming or gymnastic work. What the House means to many was expressed by a lad of eight years who, for punishment, was denied admission for one week. On Friday he asked if his "month" was "up yet," and on Saturday said, "If you will let me in today, you can take it off next week." It is aimed to make the House a neighborhood home, and it was a gratification to hear a young woman, almost a stranger to us, remark, "It seems like home when you come in here." But, although neighbors are encouraged to come to the House for instruction and wholesome "good times," we do not want in any respect to wean them from their family homes. To suggest and help carry into effect ways and means of making home more attractive, and thus strengthen family life and love, is an ambition which our workers must ever keep before them. The value of visits to neighbors' homes may be partially understood by the remark of a woman to one of our number who stopped to make a friendly call, "You have traveled about a good deal. You must know something to tell us." In addition to the 1,912 neighborhood calls made by three of our paid workers, some visits were made by volunteer helpers during the last fiscal year. (Last year's figures are largely used in this report, because they are as representative as any at this season could be.) The average daily attendance, including Sundays, for the same period, was about 108.

This does not include those coming only for baths or on brief errands. The largest attendance on a single day was about 650, but later in the spring during a Tuberculosis Exhibit of two and one-half days, there were 2,000 visitors, several hundreds of whom attended one or more of the five lectures given on the subjects of tuberculosis and milk contamination. The population of the neighborhood is becoming largely Slavic, but the work of the House has been chiefly with the Irish and Welsh. Among them are found motherless children, children whose mothers are too poor or to ignorant to give them the training they need, and again those whose mothers do not understand them. Boys, girls, fathers and mothers need friends. Many there are who have not one wise, true friend. Those who are working in the settlement come into close relationship with as many of the neighbors as possible, but the field is too large to give each the friendship craved. That the House and more workers are necessary in the neighborhood is evident.

EDNA GILBERT MEEKER, Head Worker.

Mrs. Lydia B. Walton, of Chester, here read the following:

REPORT OF THE CHILDREN'S AID SOCIETY OF CHESTER COUNTY.

So quietly and harmoniously do we move along in the study and work of this dependent child problem that we scarcely note receding time. We are convinced the success of our work largely depends upon the homes and home-makers where our little people are placed. Here the actual work is being done, for the child is almost invariably the creature of its surroundings. Thus a prudent, careful selection of homes is most necessary. So much Christian charity, unfailing patience, intelligent sympathy and good home discipline is required. Within the year the per cent of our failures has been small compared with the good results. Many of our boys and girls are nearing an age where our control ceases. Thus, we prayerfully trust, the seeds of truth and virtue which have been sown in the springtime of life may be a safeguard against the temptation into forbidden paths. One child saved is a victory, but many such children will tell in wondrous effect upon future generations.

Our board of management meets quarterly and have been occasions resulting in good both to ourselves and those under our supervision, in at least refreshing our responsibility through the interchange of thought and experience.

We feel we cannot say too much of the very kind, generous support we continue to receive from our directors of the poor and officials of our country home, and hope that every county in our state may be able to secure for these public positions men of like feeling. The active membership of our society is 200, each member paying annually 50 cents. From this source we are enabled to assist many deserving, unprotected children in different lines of life in the school or workshop on and up until fitted for self-support. County wards under our care, 166; in free homes, 140; little ones boarding, 26.

The total work done by our society cannot be estimated here, only, "He who doeth all things well can render a just account."

Mrs. H. L. Rankin, of Fayette County, stated to the convention that Dr. Murdock of the institution at Polk was detained by sickness, and wished to be remembered to the convention and that he extended an invitation to members to visit the institution at Polk.

Our report this year shows that we have received forty-two more children this year than we did last year; and our work has increased to the same or a greater extent than the number of children has.

We regret very much that we are not any nearer having a temporary home (which we very much need) than we were last year. Owing to the inconvenience of having to place the children under our care in different boarding homes, we find it is impossible to look after them as we wish, for there are but few of us to do the work.

In fact the burden falls on four or five of us—others are willing but have so many other duties they find little or no time for this work. We too have other duties but are forced to neglect them or the little ones would suffer.

Our county officials tell us our work is satisfactory to them, and we still hope that by perserverance we may at some time in the near future have a temporary home where we can do more thorough and more satisfactory work in connection with these children in our care.

In looking over some old reports I find that on October 1, 1900, we had eighteen children in boarding homes—October 1, 1907, we have sixty-five. Therefore it is easily seen, when it is considered that all other parts of the work have increased in the same proportion, just what this work means in our county—there are but few of us to carry it on and it requires so much time and attention and continual thinking and planning what we are to do with these different cases, for no two are alike. We get no salary, nor do we wish any, but you should all realize the fact that only a few in this good old county of Fayette are giving their valuable time and good advice to the poor unfortunates who come to us and who are always in need of immediate aid and assistance.

Of the sixty-five children in boarding homes, fourteen are deserted by fathers, eighteen by mothers—therefore thirty-two children are deserted by one or both parents in some of these cases. The parent left pays what he or she can towards the support of the children. Also, we have several children whom we board for the parents, they paying all, or as much as they can, of the expenses incurred thereby—this in cases where the parents are both forced to work where they cannot personally attend to their children and thus place them with us, where we see to it that they are kindly and well taken care of.

Very few counties, if any, have the assistance which we receive from our county officials—judges, district attorney, commissioners, justices, poor directors and matrons at the county homes. Our Childrens' Aid Society attorney, as well as the attorney for the poor directors, all are always ready and willing to give advice and assistance without charge, and it is needless to say that we are duly thankful and appreciate their kindness very much. And we also appreciate the kindness of the editors of our various papers who advertise for us without charge. All are doing what they can to encourage us in this noble charity and every year they find what a blessing and benefit it is to these unfortunate little ones in our county to have our Childrens' Aid Society.

Again we thank all our kind and good friends for the encouragement and good words they are always extending to us and may they all be so blessed they will feel it incumbent on them to do more and more for the helpless and unfortunate all over the land.

MRS. H. L. RANKIN, President,
MRS. ALONZO P. BOWIE, Secretary.

Dr. William J. Stewart, of Lancaster, here read the following interesting paper "Requisities for the treatment of the insane in county institutions," which was received with applause.

REQUISITES FOR THE TREATMENT OF INSANE IN COUNTY INSTITUTIONS.

By Dr. William J. Stewart.

Mr. Chairman; Ladies and Gentlemen:

The history of mental disease forms one of the most interesting chapters in the history of human civilization. It tells us of errors of the grossest sort and of almost unthinkable inhuman treatment. It is only a too lengthy account of the inhumanity of the ages that are gone. It records the many instances of insane persons being penned up with the vilest of criminals and in many instances loaded down with heavy chains. They were thus the victims of the ignorance of the time and left to the grossest cruelty of the jailer whose ear was deaf and whose heart was adamantine to the cries and pleadings of these poor suffering ones and who most readily applied the scourge mercilessly to the backs of those who had been committed to his charge.

It is an assumption that in the very earliest period of man's existence mental disease was present. In the far distant ages of the past insanity had its beginning. For a knowledge of its existence we have occasional allusions in the Old Testament which are quite likely to those who were suffering with one or other forms of mental disease. In the fourth chapter of the book of Daniel, Nebuchadnezzar, the King of Babylon, "did eat grass as oxen and his body was wet with the dew of heaven, till his hairs were grown like eagle's feathers and his nails like birds claws." The text has it, "I, Nebuchadnezzar, lifted up my eyes unto heaven and my understanding returned unto me," and "At the same time my reason returned unto me." The poetry also of centuries ago contains examples of mentally affected individuals or individuals feigning insanity.

Homer tells us of the sly Odysseus. In order that he might be relieved of participating in the Trojan war, Odysseus feigned insanity and we are told that the herd of the Iliad became insane and came to his death by throwing himself upon his sword. Shakespeare gives us Lady Macbeth.

The treatment of the insane in the very remote ages was left to the priests. It was principally along the line of religious ceremony and incantations. In the exhumed part of the ancient city of Pompeii stand the remains of a most venerable temple. With the ill fated city this temple has been buried for nearly two thousand years beneath the ashes and lava that issued from the crater of Vesuvius, Nov. 3, A. D. 79. This was a temple dedicated to Aesculapius, the fabled god of the art of healing. It was at such temples as this that the mentally affected were taken for relief. It was in such institutions as this that the priests ministered unto the needs of these suffering ones.

With the advent of Hippocrates and later that of Galen, the treatment of the insane underwent advanced improvement. There was then a passing of the priest and the treatment of the mentally affected as well as physically affected were placed upon a scientific basis. Hippocrates could in physchiatry, as in other things medical, teach us many valuable lessons. He cast aside almost entirely restraint and force in dealing with mental cases.

During the middle ages there was a marked decline in medicine. The scientific advance of Hippocrates was replaced by the stake and torture. Many indeed were the unfortunates who were put to death being tried and convicted as witches. During these times, of which the very thought makes us shudder, many were the unfortunates who were cast into dungeons and there left to die in filth and misery For centuries this condition of affairs obtained and we find as late as the eighteenth century witch trials in the early days of our country's history.

The names of Cullen, Arnold, Haslam, Perfect, John Howard, Lorry and Pinel shall be inseparably connected with the transformation of institutions which had hitherto been places for punishment and detention to hospitals for the care and treatment of the insane.

The name of Pinel is one of those immortal names that were not born to die. He acted his part well. Had he done no other work, he would have done quite sufficient to have his name enrolled in the galaxy of the world's great ones and to be forever enshrined in the hearts of those who ever stood ready to champion the cause of the down trodden and oppressed, for it was he who struck the shackles from the most unfortunate of God's creatures, for it was he who first taught that these should be treated as human beings for human beings they were. By so doing he struck the chord dominant that was instrumental in bringing to pass a reform in the care and treatment of the insane that has shaped and moulded all subsequent thought and actions until this very day.

Never before in the history of medicine has the treatment of the insane received the consideration from the medical fraternity and charity organizations such as those which you who are here today represent, as it is receiving at the present time. The unfortunate insane are no longer looked upon as beings possessed with devils or as demons incarnate and treated accordingly but today insane patients are considered, I hope, everywhere as sick patients and efforts made to restore them to their former state of mental health.

Do. not try to count today the great number of those unfortunates who were hanged, burned, or otherwise tortured because they were considered witches or persons possessed of a devil. Indeed, it is not in the very far distant past, in fact within the remembrance of many who are here today, that the insane were placed in gloomy dismal apartments, in underground or partly underground rooms and in many instances chained to the floor. No conveniences of any kind were to be found. The patients were confined in these rooms in filth and misery. Their surroundings were grewsome in the extreme quite sufficient to augment their mental trouble and to undermine their physical health.

This has been the sad condition of the unfortunates in the past and it is for us who pride ourselves upon the marked advancement in civilized life in all of its phases to ask ourselves the question, whether we are doing or trying to do all that is within our power to advance the standard of the treatment of the insane, whether we are measuring up to what is expected of us as overseers of these wards of the county and of the state, whether these wards are so housed, so clothed and so cared for that future generations when viewing our work through the lapse of years will cast no opprobrium upon our labors.

If, when we have considered the question in all points, we find that there is room for improvement and in many instances for marked improvement, it becomes our duty to seek out the weak points and remedy them. We should lose no time in inaugurating new plans and procedures that have been found efficacious in other institutions for the treatment of the insane.

The advances that have been recently made in Pennsylvania have no doubt had their counter part in other parts of our land. We find the people in general and also the legislatures waking up to the vast importance of the needs of the insane and I am proud, as a Pennsylvanian, of the action taken by the last legislature in appropriating two million, five hundred thousand dollars for the care and treatment of indigent insane. This is only one of the expressions of the interest that is being manifested in the welfare of these unfortunates.

County care of the insane versus state care is still an open question. There are among the advocates of each plan some of the ablest alienists of the state and their arguments are well worth a careful consideration. I am not here today to advocate either plan further than to say that if the county institutions can show that they are prepared in a manner of which I shall later briefly speak, to properly care for both acute and chronic insane I would have no valid reason to offer to the contrary. But if proper conditions are not obtained in county institutions I would most emphatically state that state care is the more preferable.

By the Act of May 25, 1897, county care of the indigent insane was made possible. The state hospitals becoming so greatly overcrowded, this Act was passed by the state legislature allowing the quiet, chronic patients to be cared for in county institutions. The county care act does not limit any locality as to the class of immates it may care for locally but it does make the condition that "suitable equipment and proper care" be provided.

The original idea in the minds of those who passed this act was to grant permission to the counties to care for chronic cases. Many counties are today doing more than was expected of them in the act and are admitting and caring for acute cases also. These chronic patients are in very many instances quite able to take care of themselves to a degree and who are able to engage in ward and other work. But when we consider the treatment of acutely insane patients quite a different problem confronts us. A much more elaborate equipment is necessary. When caring for the chronic cases hardly more than suitable apartments for their attention may be necessary but when we assume the responsibility of caring for the acutely insane such apartments are inadequate and we must have an institution possessing the qualifications of an up to date hospital. In some counties this obtains and their hospitals for the insane bid fare to compare with our state hospitals in their management and the character of their work.

One marked hindrance to the proper working of a hospital for the insane is the uncertain tenure of office of those who are in charge. In this respect an institution governed by a board of trustees continuous in character has a decided advantage over one governed by a board of directors elected by the people for a certain fixed period. There is no question of the value of continuous service of directors to an institution. In many instances when a director has served one term there is some political reason for his removal at a time when he is just beginning to learn the requirements of his office, to be replaced by one entirely unfamiliar with the work. The effect of such state of affairs cannot help be anything but good to the institution and the reflex effect upon the patients is anything else but salutary. We find this condition not only in relation to the directors but the other officers of the institution as well. These officers have as uncertain tenure as the directors themselves and often times more uncertain. When a man has learned the management of the institution from a business standpoint he is replaced by another who has to start at the beginning to learn. The same may be said of the medical staff of many of our institutions. When the physician has become familiar with the management of a hospital for the insane he must vacate in favor of one unfamiliar with the work.

The board of directors as is generally constituted is admirably suited for the administration of the affairs of an institution that is solely an almshouse. Their relation to such an institution is in a business sort of way. But to an institution that has a general hospital and a hospital for the insane attached their relation is a more trying one. For the best interests of such an institution there should be at least one physician on the board of directors. He alone can properly appreciate the needs of such an institution. Laymen cannot be expected to understand the management of a hospital as a medical man should for he has been peculiarly trained for this kind of work and it is he and no other who is capable of detecting defects and devising means of remedying them in the management of our hospitals for the insane and the sooner we have physicians on the managing boards of our institutions just so soon will they rise to higher planes of usefulness in the several communities in bringing the greatest good to those under their care. An ideal hospital for the insane, then, should be officered by those who have been specially trained for the places which they have been called upon to fill.

In an address before the thirty-second annual session of this association the secretary of the committee on lunacy on speaking of his observations of county institutions gave the following: "The superintendents of some of the places, and their wives would do credit to any institution that exists anywhere, but they are not trained to take care of insane people. Their ability as managers is very great and where you can find them is a puzzle to me. They run the institution in a way that cannot be excelled: from a business standpoint their management is perfect, but they are not trained to take care of insane people." Starting from this thought of Dr. Mitchell's I would hold that the management of an ideal institution should be vested in two persons. The steward, if you so care to denominate him, should act as the business manager, purchase the supplies and look after the repairs of grounds and buildings.

The patients and nurses should be entirely removed from his charge and placed in charge of the medical staff the only ones who are capable of discharging the duties relative to them. Which of you would employ a blacksmith to do the work of a contractor or builder or a stone mason to do that of a dentist. It is ridiculous to think of a layman classifying the insane and transferring them from ward to ward and furthermore passing an opinion upon the condition of the patients in an insane institution.

An institution in which the medical men do not have direct supervision of the nurses and attendants and complete supervision of the patients is not an ideally managed institution, one that works for the best interests of those committed to its care and treatment. An institution in which the medical supervision is subordinate to any other form of management is not doing and indeed cannot do the grade of work that it is expected to do, work that meets the demands of the time, work that will insure relief to those who of right ought to be receiving better things from the institutions than they are now receiving under the form of management that is present in so many of our institutions.

It has been most truthfully said that "the first requisite in the treatment of any case of ordinary insanity is a good nurse; the second, a good cook; and the third, good air with pleasant surroundings." I wonder how many of our institutions possess these requisites or in the least are striving to secure them. Without the first of these requisites we cannot hope to control or to have a regular course of treatment carried into effect; without the second requisite the patient's bodily nutrition cannot be increased as we desire that it should be and the presence of the last requisite will greatly add to the patient's chance of recovery.

Upon the good nurse depends more than all medicine that can be administered the patient's chance of recovery. I am persuaded that we do not exercise sufficient care in the selection of our nurses for the insane and when we find that they are not adapted for the work we do not get rid of them soon enough. A good nurse for the insane should be sober, industrious and at his post of duty. In order that the nurse discharges his duties to the best interests of his patients he must be in the ward with them. He must be to them more or less a companion. Reception rooms in a hospital for the insane were not intended in the general order of things for the nurses.

Dr. Ray in his work "Ideal Characters of the Officers of a Hospital for the Insane" describes the "Good Attendant" as follows: "The good attendant never shirketh his appointed work, and it is not in him to be satisfied with just that measure of performance which will enable him to keep his place. He elevateth his employment by the manner in which he performeth his duties. Though offensive to the senses, or trying to the temper or exhaustive of patience, as many of them are, yet he meeteth them all faithfully and promptly. Like every true man and true woman, he findeth that dignity inherent in every good work, that ennobles the meanest service. The good attendant is ever gentle in his words and ways, and under no provocation will he return a blow or an abusive word. Unlike the people of former times, who believed that the insane must first be made to feel that they have a master in their keeper, and for this purpose resorted to threats and blows, he seeketh to obtain the desirable control by gaining the patient's respect and this he well knoweth will not follow angry words, or harsh measures or any form of intimidation. His constant presence with the patients giveth him opportunity to see and hear much that may escape the attention of the physician in his visit and his eyes and ears are ever open for this purpose. The good attendant avoideth all vulgar ways in language, dress or demeanor as well as all familiarities which he would never venture upon outside of the hospital. He beareth in mind that the people who have fallen to his charge, however perverted or degraded by disease, were once as good as himself, if not better, and have done nothing to forfeit their claims to his respect and protection. For deficiencies of culture and of good breeding, he more than maketh up by gentle words, acts of kindness and little attentions."

I dare say that some one will ask where is the Utopia where such attendants may be found. In many instances attendants do not measure up to what they should be and the chief cause of the presence of incompetent attendants in our institutions today is the low salary that exists almost everywhere. I grant you that in some instances the salary is high as compared to the worth of the attendant for I know of attendants whose services were far from being commensurate with the salary they received. If the salary were sufficiently high more men and women of superior attainments would take up the work and there would be more of an incentive for men and women to take up nursing of mental and nervous diseases as a profession.

There should be in operation in every hospital for the insane a training school for its nurses and attendants. For chronic insane patients it is not absolutely necessary that the attendants be graduate nurses in the common acceptance of the term but they should be trained for the special line of work in which they are engaged. But for the treatment of acutely insane patients it is absolutely necessary that there be in charge of the work a trained nurse—one who has had the advantage of a general hospital training.

An insane person as I have stated above is a sick person as much so as a patient with typhoid fever or any other disease and requires the most careful nursing if any improvement is to be had in his condition. An institution for the treatment of acutely insane patients without at least one trained nurse lacks one of the most important requirements for good, efficient work and through the failure to provide trained nurses many have been the patients who have become chronic who could have otherwise been nursed back to health had the proper attention been at hand.

For the best grade of work an institution should not only have trained and graduate nurses but there should be attendants on night duty. This is vastly important. It is cruel in the extreme to lock a patient up in his room at night at eight or nine o'clock in the evening and not to be seen again until five or six the next morning. Any institution that does not provide night nurses to look after its patients during these hours is recreant to its high trust and is guilty of gross wrong to those placed in its care.

For chronic insane a good substantial diet is called for. For the acutely insane a different dietary is indicated. A large number of patients, especially those afflicted with a curable form of insanity, come under the care of the physician in a lowered physical condition and need as much food as can be assimilated. Of all the kinds of foods eggs and milk are the most important and should be had in every institution in abundance. In addition to these fruits and vegetables may be added.

The importance of occupation, amusement and educational training as valuable adjuncts in the treatment of mental disease is now everywhere recognized. In institutions that are up to date, methods and measures for the promotion of these agencies are given the most careful thought. In many of our institutions regarding employment and amusements omissions quite o'er leap the commissioners.

Patients should be encouraged to do a little work, to take care of themselves so far as cleanliness is concerned and female patients can be encouraged to look after their rooms, beds, etc. Care should be ever exercised that the insane do not over work themselves. In many cases there will be a tendency to do too little but those cases attended with excitement the tendency is to do too much.

One of the most valuable adjuncts of recent years in the treatment of the insane is the application of the principles of hydrotherapy or the scientific application of water. This being employed in many of our institutions, most notably in the larger institutions, with marked success. For several years past in well regulated institutions the bath tub has given place to the rain bath except in rare instances in which the portable tub is found to be more suitable. Suitable apparatus for the administration of the Scotch douche, jet douche, rain and needle bath could be had in any institution and their value as therapeutic agents would be inestimable.

It is to be hoped that the time is not very far distant when the most modern appliances for scientific treatment may be had in every institution throughout the length and breadth of the land. Does the fear of expense operate against our best judgment in these things that would be to the best interests of those who depend upon our institutions for relief?

"When earth's last picture is printed, and the tubes are twisted and dried,
When the oldest colours have faded, and the youngest critic has died."

The work of our stewardship will not be reckoned in point of dollars and cents but in that hour it will be determined in the terms of "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

It is to be hoped that we have come up to this convention that our individual institutions may profit thereby. It is for us to join hands in the inspiring work and help each other in solving the problems of our individual institutions. Let us give to one another freely of our best inspirations and with this let us each zealously strive to obtain for his own institution the very best results. By so doing we shall be worthy of this commonwealth, the greatest of all commonwealths, and of this the grandest and noblest Republic.

Col. Gould, of Erie: This is one of the most creditable papers we have had for a long time. It shows that the person has studied the subject. I hope the members will carefully study this paper, because it is a credit to the association and to the member who gave it.

Dr. Jane Langsden: I hope this convention will ask that this paper be published in one or two of the county papers in every county. I come from Greene county. It ought to be published in every county, for educational purposes.

President Srodes read an invitation from the Meadville City Hospital to visit that institution.

The discussion "Needy Families and How to Relieve Them" was opened by Mr. Walter Bowditch, of Germantown, who said:

This question has never been settled and to my mind today it is one of the hardest problems that the directors of the poor and those engaged in charitable work have to accomplish.

This to my opinion is a question that has baffled the minds of the most able men from time immemorial and the question once settled satisfactorily would make the subject of relieving the needy families who apply to our poor directors for relief a work easy to perform, but that question has not yet been solved anywhere near to perfection and I believe today it is one of the most difficult problems that the directors of the poor and those engaged in charitable work have to face from time to time: this question of needy families and how to relieve them. It depends a great deal on the nature of the families with which we have to deal. If it is the honestly unfortunate family who through no cause of their own have lost their little all through sickness or loss of work or some other unfortunate occurence, the task in this case is an easy one to solve. That family needs temporary relief only. As soon as the head of that family can find employment he gets to work and relief from the directors of the poor ceases, simply because he secures employment. Just what he wanted and he is now able to help himself and provide for those who look to him for care and protection. In relieving such a family as I said before the honestly unfortunate case, you have done a good work in helping that man to help himself, and in helping himself he helps and cares for those near and dear to him.

Now you have another call for relief from a needy family, but altogether a different problem to solve. This time this call comes from the mother of a large family with the head of it a man addicted to drink. Now my experience has taught me that you have a pitiful case to relieve, children with distressed appearance, hardly sufficient clothes to cover their bodies, misery and fear depicted in their innocent faces. And the mother, a good woman, and her only hope in life is to raise the children to become sober, honest and industrious men and women. and this is often accomplised by the mother of such a family (a case in mind). Of course you relieve that family and have it to do time and again sometimes by appealing to the manhood of the father. You are able to keep him fairly straight for a time and in some few cases by kind words and encouragement on your part that man sees the folly of his actions, repents and becomes a good sober citizen, a credit to himself, his family and the community in which he resides.

Now comes another call this time from the never do well, who applies for relief with his long pitiful tale of woe and he knows just how to give it to you, in a professional way. This needy family and how to relieve it is for you to solve. Of all needy families and how to relieve them, the case of the never do well is the most difficult of all to my mind. He, you will always have under any and every condition, you cannot get rid of him. He is always on your trail. He is always in want (of course he is) and always will be. And that family Mr. Director of the Poor will be on your list so long as you continue to be a director of the poor and that family in the name of charity you will be called on to relieve for the mother and childrens sake, and the never do well is always with us as he has been from time immemorial.

Now the needy family and how to relieve them depends a great deal on their surroundings, the nature of those you have to deal with What I find to be a great help to me is to interest the ladies in this work. Take them out to investigate the case with you and how often they prove to be able to handle such families far better than you could do yourself.

Charles Snyder, of Philadelphia: This question comes right down to every director of the poor. I was for fifty years nearly, connected with our institution, and then moved out of the district and thought I never would have anything more to do with it, but two years ago the people unanimously put me back into the institution to see if I could help do some of the work I had done before. Our directors were giving relief to families who were not needy. One family had been getting relief for six years before I went back and when the lady came to me I asked her where she lived, and she says, "I have been getting relief six years and no questions asked me. You never visit me." But I visited her and thought that family didn't need any relief. She afterwards met with an accident and died and left $11,000 in cash, to a church. She had been hoodwinking the directors I have made an application to the court to see if they will allow back the money we have paid in the last six years to that family.

I relieve every family I think is in need of assistance, but I investigate them and if they don't need it I don't give it. Sometimes families need relief temporarily. A husband is out of work, or the mother is sick, and we must look after the mother and the little ones.

I have a sad case now of that kind. If there was more attention paid to the surroundings of these cases we wouldn't have as many needy families to report. Directors of the poor should get in touch with the people and invite them to their institution and show them their work. People hesitate to pay poor tax, unless they know where it is going.

We came near losing our institution last winter by an act of the legislature. But one of the best things we ever did was to hold a centennial anniversary at our place and invited the directors and their friends and the ex-officials to meet with us, and it was the best advertisement we ever had. Some of them said they didn't know there was such a place in existence until they came there. The people got interested and now we have no trouble with them.

Mr. Snyder's remarks were received with applause.

Mr. H. W. Ochse, of Allegheny, read the following paper which was received with applause.

Prior to the Act of 1897, the duty of the state to children under the age of 16 years, charged with the violation of law, had not impressed itself upon the minds of the legislature. In 1898 the legislature enacted a law providing that "Boards of School Directors and School Controllers in cities, boroughs and townships should employ a person, to be known as Attendance Officer, whose duty would be to look after, apprehend and place habitual truants in such schools as the parent or relative might designate: and further, that Boards of Directors or Controllers of any School District, or in two or more Districts jointly, might establish special schools for children who are habitually truants, or who are insubordinate or disorderly during their attendance upon instruction in the public schools."

Under the provisions of this latter act, the Board of Directors in various school districts established what was known as Truant Schools, to which was committed children charged with truancy, or as being insubordinate.

In the main, such schools were open during the usual school hours. After the closing the children returned to their homes. The only detention and the only direction and immediate supervision being during the school hour.

In the session of 1901, an act was passed regulating the treatment and control of dependent, neglected and delinquent children, under the age of 16 years, and providing for the establishment of Juvenile courts. Under the provisions of this act, the courts of Oyer and Terminer and General Jail Delivery and the courts of Quarter Sessions of the peace of the several counties in the state constitute what is known as a Juvenile court, one of the judges in each court being designated to hear all complaints and causes pending before the court. Hearings are held in special court rooms and separate dockets or records of proceedings are kept. After trial, the child charged with any offense under the act may be discharged or returned to the custody of its parents, or if found dependent or neglected within the meaning of the act, the court may commit the child to the care of some suitable institution; or of some reputable citizen of good moral character; or some Training or Industrial School, and the court may order and direct the parent to contribute to the support of the child. The act carefully guards the interest of the child, and is specific in direction as to the penalties to be imposed by the court upon the several charges for which the child may be arraigned. A child under the age of 14 years cannot be committed to the jail or police court, but may, in default of bail, be placed in the care of the sheriff, police officer or probation officer and until trial confined in some suitable place outside of the enclosure of the jail or police station designated by the proper authority.

It will be observed that the child is not held, confined, tried nor sentenced as a criminal, but the entire purpose and intent of the act is to treat the child as a ward of the state, and discloses that the interest of the state is in the moral and intellectual development of the child, and is equal if not superior to that of the parent.

The child of today is the citizen of the morrow, whose vote and exercise of right of franchise not only elects executive, legislative and administrative officers, but also determines the policy of government. No form of government known is so dependent upon an intellectual and educated citizenship as is this American government. From the municipal to the national government, every branch of civil and administrative policy rests upon and is determined by the will and wish of the citizen. If he be educated, even in the elementary principles of government, with sufficient knowledge to enable him to read, think and reach conclusions, he will give to the government support along lines best adapted to its preservation and prosperity. The compulsory act and the juvenile court law have for their purpose the control of the child in such manner that the interests of the child will be safe-guarded, and be given an opportunity to acquire at least the elements of an education. In practice, however, the limitations of the juvenile court and the statutes governing it have been disclosed. It is the experience and observation of those having to do with juvenile courts that a very large per centage of children arraigned in the court are charged with truancy or incorrigibility. This, in a large measure is due to heedlessness and carelessness of the child, but more to lack of parental control. Many children under the age of fourteen years of age are arrested for violations of law, the violations being at times petty and at other times serious. The disposition of such children is always a matter of great concern. To commit such a one to the ordinary reformatory, in which he will meet children of greater age and a more varied and perhaps more criminal experience, does not seem to be entirely wise and prudent. The solution would seem to be along the line of Truant Schools. Such schools, however, to have absolute charge of the child, its care and maintenance during a period to be fixed by the court. Such care and maintenance to be at the cost of the parents. This would enable the court to practically confine an habitual truant, or one guilty of some crime, to the Truant School, there to receive that care, discipline and correction as might be required. The only objection to such schools would be the cost. The importance, however, of proper care of the children is so great that the expense, even though large, would probably be willingly incurred, or, at least this is a proper subject for consideration by our legislative bodies.

We believe that the splendid past of our nation will be surpassed by a more progressive and enlightened future. But that future will be determined by the children whose minds and characters are being formed and moulded under the influence and in the churches and schools we maintain for their training. The responsibility rests not upon the parent alone, he may be careless, indifferent or lack means either morally or financially. It is the duty of the state to see that every child is not only provided with the possibility of an education, but that every means be employed to the end that the child shall reach manhood with a preliminary training necessary to fit him for American citizenship.

Mrs. W. H. Wise, of Oil City, presents Report of the Children's Aid Society of Western Pennsylvania, and said:

I feel that I ought to preface my report with a little story as sort of an apology to the Secretary of this Association. One morning last summer a little before six o'clock, following an intensely hot night; one of those nights when you repeat poetry and count sheep going over the stile and decide finally that life isn't worth living, my next door neighbor began running his lawn mower up and down under my window, because he couldn't sleep. Meeting him afterwards, I said to him: "Neighbor, only for my distaste for neighborhood quarrels I would feel like trimming you," and he says, "My wife has already trimmed me." (Laughter.)

I have a heart full of sympathy for the man who makes up the program. I have made programs myself and had my best numbers fail me at the last moment. The maker of this program got his trimming yesterday, I thought.

Mrs. Wise here read the following report, which was received with applause.

CHILDREN'S AID SOCIETY REPORT FOR THE YEAR ENDING SEPTEMBER 1st, 1907.

By Mrs. W. H. Wise.

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen:

Wsn't it Mark Twain who said every party of tourists should have one ignorant woman to ask the questions the others do not like to ask, and shouldn't every well organized association make the same provision? And should not a short residence in Missouri entitle one to the appointment? For I shall surely have to be shown how Mr. Colborn had the temerity to mail to a busy woman deep in the mysteries of pickles and preserves a post card bearing such modest marching orders as these: "You are on the program. You will please accept the assignment; be present and respond when called upon."

And also how the lady from Philadelphia can report the work of the Children's Aid Society of Pennsylvania, while I am thinking I am representing twenty-two (22) counties of Pennsylvania myself, and of which a brief report follows:

It is the province of the Children's Aid Society of Western Pennsylvania to provide private homes for destitute children with a view to adoption. This involves boarding for a brief space of time in temporary homes—physical treatment when needed, clothing, and the innumerable necessities accompanying the prosecution of a work of this character.

The twenty-two counties organized are Allegheny, Armstrong, Beaver, Butler, Cambria, Cameron, Centre, Clarion, Clearfield, Crawford, Elk, Fayette, Greene, Indiana, Jefferson, Lawrence, Mercer, McKean, Somerset, Venango, Warren and Washington.

If you have driven over the hills of Western Pennsylvania you may have some idea of what it means to visit one thousand children. These children must be visited as often as possible until they are legally adopted.

Allegheny County takes the lead this year in adoptions, having twenty-one (21) children adopted. I am proud to say that my county, Venango, in company with Centre County, falls next in line with six each legally adopted. The honors really belong to Centre County, however, as Centre County had six adoptions out of seventeen (17) children cared for; Venango County six out of fifty-eight (58) children cared for, and Allegheny County 21 one of 242 children cared for.

These figures were furnished by the Actuary at Pittsburg.

I ask your indulgence for taking advantage of the opportunity to sound Venango County's Gabriel.

According to the statements of The Safe Deposit and Trust Company of Pittsburg, our financial representative, we have received from the State of Pennsylvania for the year	$5,000.00
From other sources	295.04
Total receipts	$5,295.04
We have expended in the prosecution of our work	$5,352.83
Overdraft	$ 57.79

As you know our methods, you do not care for a detailed report of expenditures, although I have such a report with me in order to give any desired information.

Separate and apart from this you will hear from Mrs. Willard, of our Industrial School at Indiana, which we own and maintain for the training of insubordinates preparatory to placing them in permanent homes.

The several counties have various methods for procuring the money used towards the maintenance of this school.

The Children's Aid Society does a great and necessary work. If we have any message to send out in this age of fast living, it is that parents may be more keenly alive to their responsibility to the point of exercising more authority.

It is your duty, or mine or the parents, to know where their boys and girls are at night. Surely the parents before any others should know whether the fruits eaten in secret are tending towards the elevation of the soul or undermining the moral character of their children.

Let me conclude with a quotation from Phillips Brooks:

"He who helps a child helps humanity with a distinctness, with an immediateness, which no other help, given to human creatures at any other stage of their human life, can possibly give again."

THE PRACTICAL SIDE OF CHILDREN'S AID WORK.

By Mrs. Alonzo P. Bowie.

There are two sides to Children's Aid Society work as to most things in life. First, what we may call the sentiment side; the thought of taking poor little homeless, unloved, uncared for waifs and placing them in clean, moral, peaceful and loving homes where their starved natures may grow and develop till they reach the standard of ideal citizenship, appeals to the mother heart in every woman. This is fortunate indeed, for there can be no greater work than that of giving every one, even a child, "a square deal" and an opportunity to grow up an "image of God," as he was created.

But just because this side does appeal so strongly to every one, I wish to call your attention for a few minutes to the other, less attractive though more practical side of the work—that is the report making, which we doubtless all find so tiresome, chiefly because it must be done so exactly.

In the secretary's monthly report, for instance, see how many times one poor child may appear and yet he must figure but once in the total.

Let us begin with him as "received from the almshouse." We "place him in a boarding home," then in a "free home;" he may not prove satisfactory there, and we "transfer him to a new home in the country," or he may be returned to the boarding home and so make himself two in that space. Then we may send him to a hospital or to Polk and he shows up again, or he may die, be adopted, returned to friends, or transferred to another county, in which case, after showing another, first, on our report we subtract him from our first total and are through with him, that is, if he is dead; if not, he's liable to turn up again and repeat the whole program. It may appear a little queer to some that we can fill nearly a whole report with one child and at the end perhaps have none at all, but you can easily see how this is possible. And just here is where we are liable to get confused in making our annual report—we sometimes account for more children than our "total under care at present" shows that we have, so we must look over our books till we can make our accounts tally.

Then there are blanks for "number of children visited" and "number of visits made for the society" and I am afraid very few of us are able to report sufficiently large figures there, though this is a very essential part of our work and our neglect of it excites unfavorable comment by the authorities at Harrisburg. This ought to be remedied, but I suppose all the counties have the same trouble in finding anyone willing or indeed capable of loving the visiting. The visitor's experience is often quite unpleasant, for some people feel that we are trying to pry into what is none of our business—in other cases, however, they are very nice and give us opportunity to talk with the child alone, and everything seems all right, and yet sometimes these finally prove to be more unsatisfactory homes than the first.

There is a great deal of the wisdom of the serpent required by a good visitor, but it is a work that must be done and done frequently until the child is either adopted or old enough to take care of himself.

The treasurers' reports are not so confusing and when warrants are used the treasurer is relieved of a great deal of responsibility, for she only gives checks to correspond with the warrant given by the secretary. However, as her money is often received in small sums from parents or friends, she has quite trouble enough in keeping her reports straight. And there is one blank in the treasurers' reports which too many of us prefer to leave blank, that is, "unpaid bills." Surely we must almost always have some in our county of Fayette. For instance, we pay all bills monthly—on the last Friday our treasurer's report is to the end of the month, so we may have anywhere from one to six days' board due at that time. Of course, we could make our quarter end with the last Friday and so avoid this item, but we find the other less confusing. We used to pay our bills at different times and it was a great nuisance, but with this plan we have no trouble and our boarding house people have found it much easier for them too. But the thing above all others I wish to emphasize is the necessity for sending in our reports promptly. At the executive meetings there are frequently not more than fifteen or sixteen reports in, when there ought to be twenty-three at last. This is all wrong. One object of these monthly meetings is to keep track of the work done, and if the counties send in no reports the presumption must be that they have done no work; but, even that is no excuse if you have done nothing, still send in your report. You know there is a rule now, "no reports," no quarterly allowance.

I think we do not all realize how much we are before the public. Our secretary must make a sworn statement to the Auditor General at Harrisburg and she can only do this promptly and accurately as she receives our reports promptly, and as our appropriation depends on the amount of work shown by this report, let us resolve that another year we will give her no cause of complaint and will ourselves get credit for all the work we do. If our own county meetings don't come early enough for the report to get to Pittsburg before the first Thursday of each month, let us change our dates; we can't change the time of the Pittsburg meeting.

I hope you will not consider me presumptuous in writing as I have, as I have had fifteen years of this work and I have only tried to make straight to those who may be new to it, the seemingly crooked or at least round about ways of report making.

Col. E. P. Gould, of Erie, presented the following report on "Legislation and What It Has Accomplished," which showed a resume of all the legislation affecting the work that the association is interested particularly in, and which was received with attention and interest.

LEGISLATION AND WHAT IT HAS ACCOMPLISHED.
By Col E. P. Gould.

It has been the practice in this state to refer to Acts of Assembly by giving the year the act was passed and stating the date that the Governor approved it. As there are sometimes 20 or more bills approved by the Governor on the same day it sometimes requires time to find the act cited. The acts to which I shall refer are by the numbers given them in the session laws and the page on which the act is printed. I mention only those acts of the last legislature which in any way bear upon those questions which we as an association are interested in. With this explanation I call your attention to the following acts of the last legislature.

No. 4, page 6—This act amends act of 1867 for the relief of wives and children deserted by their fathers and husbands so that the court is not limited in fixing the amount of support.

No. 7, page 8—This act extends the provisions of the act of 1885 providing for the burial of soldiers, sailors and marines of the Civil War who have no means, to those who served in the Spanish War

No. 17, page 31—This act extends the benefits of the Pennsylvania Soldiers' and Sailors' Home to those who served in the Spanish War.

No. 76, page 91—Changes the name of the Thaddeus Stevens Industrial and Reform School to the Thaddeus Stevens Industrial School of Pennsylvania.

No. 132, page 170—This act amends the act of 1905 which provides for medical aid to be given to all needy persons who have been bitten by mad dogs, so that all persons who may apply who have been bitten by dogs or other animal having rabies may be treated.

No. 157, page 197—This act provides for free treatment of indigent persons suffering from tuberculosis, establishing sanitaria and appropriating $600,000 for that purpose.

No. 162, page 201—Authorizes employers to pay the family or next of kin wages not exceeding $75.00 of a deceased employe—thus avoiding the expense of taking out letters of administration.

No. 176, page 227—This act enlarges the remedies of married women when deserted by their husbands and provides better provisions for their support.

No. 183, page 231—This act authorizes the Board of Public Charities of the state to appoint two assistant general agents whose duties it will be to assist in inspecting the penal and charitable institutions of the state.

No. 216, page 285—This act provides that when the head of a family is quarantined because of any infectious or contagious disease, and for that reason is unable to maintain himself or family, it shall while so quarantined be considered a poor or indigent person within the meaning of the poor laws of the state.

No. 220, page 288—Amends the act of 1903 so that justices of the peace or magistrates cannot commit habitual drunkards to an asylum for treatment. Hereafter the committing power can only be exercised by the Court of Quarter Sessions.

No. 221, page 290—Provides for the employment of the inmates of insane, feeble minded and epileptic institutions, and for the distributions of articles by such institutions.

No. 222, page 292—Provides for the protection of insane, feeble minded and epileptic persons; appointment of guardians to take care of their property, authorizing such guardians to support the families of their wards, and for that purpose to sell real estate if necessary.

No. 228, page 302—Giving to the commissioners of townships of the first class power to establish boards of health and provide for the support and regulation of the same.

No. 238, page 318—Provides for the better protection and support of children under 16 years of age. This act punishes severely parents or others having charge of such children for neglect of duty, and in case of criminal prosecution husbands and wives cannot be protected from disclosing confidential communications.

No. 240, page 320—Provides for better sanitation of school-rooms and regulating the heating and ventilation of the same.

No. 241, page 321—This act amends the act of 1901 and other acts relating to truant children, defines truancy, and punishes offenders who employ or aid children to avoid attending school.

No. 247, page 331—Provides for the payment of the costs and expenses of placing indigent and dependent children in homes and supporting them in such homes.

No. 273, page 381—Transfers the management of the sanitorium in Franklin County established for the treatment of incipient tuberculosis from the Forestry Commissioner to the Department of Health.

No. 282, page 386—Provides for the protection of the public health by prohibiting the manufacture or sale of impure, deleterious and poisonous foods and confections; and provides for the punishment of violators.

No. 288, page 417—This act gives to hospitals the right of eminent domain for necessary land and water privileges.

No. 298, page 438—Is an amendment of the Juvenile Court Act providing for certain fees and expenses of officers.

No. 319, page 487—Fixing the salaries of county poor directors in counties of over 150,000 population at $1,500.00 per year. This act does not apply to counties now paying more than the salary named in the act.

No. 320, page 487—Fixing the salaries of Directors of the Poor in the several counties of the Commonwealth and providing for their expenses. This act does not apply to counties having over 150,000 population.

No. 326, page 520—This act repeals the act of 1868 which increases the salaries of the directors of the poor in Northampton County. The three last acts mentioned were approved by the Governor on the same day, viz: June 8, 1907.

No. 326, page 529—This act provides for the election of three directors of the poor in Schuylkill County and fixing their salaries at $1,200.00 and all necessary expenses. The present directors to serve out their terms of office in conjunction with the newly elected ones. The first election to be held in 1908 for all of the three directors, and no elector to vote for more than two directors.

No. 347, page 539—This act gives the Board of Public Charities power to employ experts to advise them as to the probable cost of proposed construction and repairs asked for by the various institutions of the state.

In further discussion some of the Acts Col. Gould said:

As to No. 183, on page 231—This is a very commendable Act. The only fault is that two are not enough to properly inspect the public institutions as they should be inspected. This association has repeatedly demanded a better inspection of the public institutions. No three men can properly inspect the institutions of the state as they ought to be inspected, two or three times a year. Before this it was all imposed on the General Agent of the Board.

As to No. 221, on page 290—The Colonel said:

One of the things that the state has had to contend with is the demand of the Union labor people that none of the public institutions should manufacture anything to be sold to the public. In other words that the inmates of our insane and other institutions must not make anything that can be used outside of the institution. For that reason that they must be kept in idleness. This law has been passed to somewhat relieve that trouble. It tells how they may be employed and how the articles manufactured can be used in the other institutions of the state.

As to the Act which by its title fixes the salaries of the directors of the poor in all the counties of the state:

You will see that when it gets to counties having 150,000 population it doesn't go any further. Now is that a defect in the title, which kills the bill? That is a question to be determined.

There is another question; there are about twenty counties where the County Commissioners are ex-officio directors of the poor. Does this fix their salary, and how does it affect their other salary? It is questionable whether this act will stand. It it doesn't stand where does Northampton county stand?

Now we come to the act, as to Schuylkill county: That is the only county in the state that I know of that has attempted to make the directors of the poor non partisan: where no one can vote for the three, and where they are all elected at the same time. I don't believe in electing all of the directors at the same time. Because when the new board comes in there is no one to guide them and they have to learn it all over.

As to the last act, giving to the Board of Public Charities the power to employ experts, etc., that is a very commendable act. Every charitable institution that receives state aid comes to the state board with a demand that they be given an appropriation to build an addition, or something of the kind and the state board have no means of advising themselves as to the matter, only as they are told by the representatives of the institution, as to what it will cost. This act gives them the power to employ an expert to find what it will cost so they may know how much to recommend.

Mrs. Lindsey: As to Act 216, providing that when the head of a family is quarantined he shall be considered a poor or indigent person, does that act provide that the directors shall pay to the head of the family the equivalent of the salary that he has been receiving?

Col. Gould: No; it is only to take care of the family.

H. W. OCHSE,
M. K. CHRIST,
A. F. SWANK,
Auditing Committee.

Meadville, Oct. 9, 1907.

Mr. Chas. Snyder, of Philadelphia, moved that the report of the Auditing Committee be accepted and spread upon the records of the association.

The motion is agreed to.

Upon motion the convention here adjourned until eight o'clock this evening.

At two o'clock cars were in waiting to convey the delegates to the county home, and most of the members availed themselves of the opportunity to visit this fine institution.

After making a general inspection of the institution refreshments were served by Mr. and Mrs. Thompson and able assistants, and the delegates were brought back to the city, having spent a pleasant afternoon and all expressing themselves as well pleased with the institution and with their treatment.

EVENING SESSION.
Wednesday, October 9, 1907.

The convention was called to order by President Srodes at eight o'cluock.

Fred Fuller, of Scranton, presented the following report of the Committee on Officers for the ensuing year, which upon motion was accepted and adopted.

F. H. NIBECKER.

Mrs. Adrian W. McCoy, of Meadville, here read the following paper, which was received with applause:

THE CARE OF CHILDHOOD AND OLD AGE.
By Mrs. Adrian W. McCoy.

In accepting an invitation to talk at this convention I did not assume that I should be able to tell you anything new, nor anything that has not already come within your experience.

I believe that you are representative citizens of the several counties of Pennsylvania and if you are not it is mostly the fault of the voters. There was perhaps a time when almost anyone would do for a director of the poor or a county commissioner, but with the spirit of modern progress, and the general awakening of the public mind regarding sociological subjects and the administration of public affairs such a notion has no place.

In addition to your powers over the material affairs of your counties, you have much to do with the moral welfare of the state, through your relations to the helpless poor including children and the old or infirm, as well as your supervision to a great degree of criminals and vagrants. In a sense you are autocrats in your domains, and more and more do our voters realize the necessity of placing in these positions men of good business judgment, especially when the offices of poor director and county commissioner are combined. Men who will achieve the highest results from the lowest tax levy and at the same time look upon their local social problems in a broadminded way, that shall comprehend moral social results ten or twenty years hence as well as the condition of the treasury for the current fiscal year.

While you must provide jails you should aim to make conditions such that there will be less occasion for their occupancy. For some your jail is a place of detention; for others a place of punishment. Where the latter is intended it should be carried out. Nothing good comes from coddling the tramp or indulging in hysteria over the vicious. For both classes instead of unrestricted intercourse in a common room where there is nothing to do but eat, smoke, play cards and exchange experiences, there should be serious occupation. An attempt has been made to furnish this through county prison boards, but owing to the extra expense and trouble but little is done. There is no doubt that a system of keeping inmates of jails occupied would be beneficial, even if troublesome and expensive for the time being, and whoever shall evolve a practical system of work for prisoners, will have done a notable public service.

Is it not true that young children are allowed to visit the jails and often find a sort of comfort and entertainment there that, to their childish minds, seems more to be sought than shunned? To me this is appalling. And is it not also true that the women occupants are not always attended by women. It seems to me that these things should be immediately reformed. That when it is imperative that a child should see a prisoner, there should be a place other than the common prison room for the meeting, and that it should be attended by all seriousness. And that there should be a woman connected with every jail to attend to the women and that great care should be taken in her selection. For if, by her tactful management, one girl a year should be saved it would be worth while.

Some crimnologists estimate that confined criminals each cost the state on an average $1,200 a year, and the more pessimistic state that before many years the expenses of jails, police courts and other incidentals will have become an exceedingly heavy burden upon the honest members of society. It may be alleviated by devising useful labors in jails and elsewhere and it may be prevented to a great degree by rescuing the young, saving them from drifting into crime, and training them to become useful members of society. If a criminal costs society $1,200 a year, the elimination of that expense and conversion into a valuable asset is something which deserves our thought and consideration. This, the Childrens' Aid Society aims to do, by taking the little ones, caring for them, giving them as much training as possible and eventually placing them in families where they are most likely to become desirable members of society.

"This country spends $6,000,000,000 annually on the criminal pauper and vicious classes and the annual increase of wealth is only $5,000,000,000. Is it not a question worthy of consideration and to make thinking citizens stop to take notice?"

This statement, so startling in the way in which the proposition is put was made by Dr. Charles J. Bushnell, who was graduated from Heidelberg university and who is said to be an authority on civic matters. He resides in Washington. He further says:

"Why, the $6,000,000,000 that this nation spends every year on its criminal classes equals the amount spent on all churches, public libraries, the young women's christian association, the salvation army, public hospitals, asylums for the insane and all benevolent institutions. "Immorality consumes more of the public's money than is paid our public school teachers—fully four times as much. The average factory hand earns $440 a year, while it is estimated that the average criminal costs the public $1,200 a year."

We have jails and we are pleased if the jails are unoccupied. Likewise we establish county homes for the care of the needy and we are pleased if we have many vacant rooms, for it shows that the country is prosperous or that people are caring for their own dependent ones.

Owing to vastly improved conditions the odium attached to beneficiaries of county homes is greatly lessened. Better methods are used and higher thought given to these institutions, and without a doubt many of those who find a refuge in our county homes enjoy far more of the necessities and conveniences and even the luxuries of life, than they ever found elsewhere, and it has been said that the per centage of immates of county institutions who become such through undeserved misfortune is small. Improved buildings, intelligent management, and furnishing employment to inmates, have worked wonders, but it is at best by no means an easy proposition to rightly manage such an institution. There are the deserving, the unworthy, the neat, the filthy, the good tempered and the ill tempered, those of bright intellect and the weak minded, even the insane. To the question is there a stigma attached to the poor house even at its best, a prompt answer will come if you put the question to yourself, thus proving there is a field for endeavor in the development of a plan that shall separate the worthy unfortunate from the others. If the per centage of worthy unfortunates is low so much the easier.

It would seem like good public policy for the state to formulate an insurance plan similar to that of Germany or some modification thereof. Insurance has been made such a study of late that this phase is timely. An old age or disability policy which would insure the holder admission to an institution concerning which there could be no more disgrace than attached to the payment of an accident policy, would be a good measure. The policies could be graded in terms of payment and one person might have the privilege of taking out more than one, transferable under proper conditions. The state or national government taking charge of such a plan would insure permanency and eliminate the risk which might be possible in ordinary insurance. Any competent actuary could arrange a table of rates that would be self sustaining. If the fee for admission into most homes for the aged of $300 to $500 is a fair one, it can be seen that no impossibility would be attempted although, it would take some time to put it into successful operation. No cause could be more worthy than the development and establishment of a system which would remove from the minds of old people the fear that there is a possibility of their going over the hills to the poor house or becoming objects of charity through some unexpected combination of circumstances.

Christian denominations and the fraternal societies do much toward smoothing the pathway down life's hill by the maintainence of old men's and old women's homes, and there is no reason why existing institutions of this character may not be used in connection with a state old age insurance plan. Our civilization will remain imperfect until a way is provided for the worthy aged and disabled, who having done their share of the world's work, may from some cause, come to need a place where they can end their days in peace, beyond the fear of want and above any hint of pauperism, and its real or imaginary disgrace.

An old German story tells us that there was once an old man who could scarcely walk, his knees shook, he could hardly see or hear, and he had no teeth. At the table he held his spoon with difficulty, and he spilled his soup on the table cloth. The old man lived with his son whose wife was greatly annoyed at the untidyness of the table after the old man had eaten.

Finally after he had broken a plate it was decided that he should eat his meals alone, in the corner and that he should have a wooden plate. Not long thereafter the four year old son was found on the floor trying to hollow out a board. What mak'st thou? asked the father. I make a wooden bowl, out of which father and mother shall eat when they are old. The father and mother were so overcome that they wept, and the grandfather was again given his place at the table, and his dishes were like the dishes of the family.

While the care of the old appeals to our sense of duty, affection or gratitude, that of the young appeals not only to the emotions, but to the quasi-selfish interests in the betterment of society. It is surely a profitable investment if we can train into a respectable, useful man or woman, even one child which might if neglected become an undesirable citizen. President Roosevelt is right in his classification into desirable and undesirable citizens and the sooner the American people adopt his view, the stronger will be our national character. If we wish our affairs in the future to be managed by decent, law abiding people who respect themselves and recognize the rights of others, we must train for it. In sterling national character is our safety for the future. Without it we shall be at the mercy of the capitalistic robber, and the irresponsible, selfish demagogue. The child of today is the man or woman of the next decade, and nothing can be more important than the right formation of his character. There is no science of greater moment to the state and the home, than the training of good men and women. If our boys are brave, honest and industrious, and our girls wise, pure minded and capable, the endurance of the greatest Republic the sun ever shone on is assured, for our public morals will be just about what our individual standard makes them. The Childrens' Aid Society aims to supply real homes for children who lack them; to take the waif or the helpless child and place him in a home where he will have his chance and as far as possible to protect and guard him until he can act for himself. It has done a great work since its foundation and with the growing accord between its members and the directors of the poor it will be more useful and effective than ever.

The Childrens' Aid Society, of Western Pennsylvania, was founded in 1885. In 1889 a charter was granted. It consists of 22 counties. During the first year of its existence it did a magnificient work in aiding the afflicted at the time of the Johnstown flood. Although their special mission was to care for the children rendered homeless by that terrible catastrophe, the latchstring of their room was out for all who might need their aid and many of those Christian women, ministers, doctors and lawyers from all parts of the country accepted their hospitality. The reports of the different societies given at this convention will give you a better idea than I can of the great work of the Childrens' Aid Society. The society not only stands ready to do the work to which its charter binds it, but its members are bands of women who could be easily rallied in case of any disaster to state or nation.

Just a word in closing about the Meadville home for children and old age. As I was not active in starting this home I feel freer to speak on the subject. I have been so glad for unavoidable reasons, I was not present at the meetings which decided the purchase of the home, and the combination of caring for the old with the young, for I am sure I should have voted nay on both questions and the results proved that the course taken by the society was the wisest that could have been followed. If it never does more good than it has already done, it has paid. Already the passing to the eternal of one old person has been made easier. In her last hours she was surrounded by a watchfulness, a tenderness and affection which could scarcely have been more, had she been in the midst of family ties.

That the eleven children and five old ladies who are its present inmates are happy one needs only to visit the place to learn. I am sure that the touches of home life and motherliness that are displayed there would convert every witness no matter how opposed he might be before a study of this magnificient home. I say magnificient, not in the sense of elegance. You will find there the spirit of Christ, you will find eleven children, who although perhaps motherless and fatherless, are contented and happy. At times you will find them gathered around the piano. You will find them singing hymns, perhaps not in tune, perhaps off the key, but it touches the heart. You will, if you are there at the right time hear each one of them say his, "Now I lay me" before he goes to sleep.

One day as I stood in the house and no one knew I could see or hear, the street car stopped, an inmate of the home, who I afterwards learned was blind alighted, the matron met her with a welcome that could not have been surpassed had she been her own mother. A woman lies there at the present moment hovering between life and death, yet there is a smile on her face which says, "I have found rest here, I have found a home." Home! the most beloved of all words. Is it worth while, was it a good thing to start this home? As well ask if anything in life is worth while. Surely, nothing in Meadville, nothing in the state, unless it is a similar institution doing a greater work, is more worth while.

They tell me the home is not large enough. They tell me they have more applicants than they can accommodate. They ask me if I think it a safe venture to buy a larger home, and I, the not long pessimist, say yes. The Lord must prosper such a work as this. And surely no man or woman, who understands this work, who understands what is going on in that home, could do other than help to further its ends. There can be no work greater than making the last months of the aged easier, or the making of boys and girls better.

The time of life when we glory in our strength, when we feel the keen zest for evercoming difficulties and for accomplishment is both preceded and followed by periods of partial and complete dependence upon others. It should be the pride of our century that it shall have done two things; made it possible for every child to grow into moral, physical, and mental health and vigor, and made it certain that worthy old age shall not fear that through some misfortune, the winter of life, may become a season of want, privation and abandonment. We can only do these two things by thinking, planning and working, by instilling and cultivating a reverential care for the old and a tender solicitude for the little. For such, said the Man of Galilee, is the Kingdom of Heaven.

President Srodes here called for the report of the committee on place of next meeting.

Dr. W. A. Payne: For two or three years we have held the meetings in the western part of the state. We felt it was well to go East. Three names were mentioned: West Chester, Chambersburg and Hazelton. The committee are unanimous in recommending to the association the city of West Chester as a suitable place for the next meeting.

Mr. H. W. Ochse moves that the report of the committee be adopted.

The report is agreed to.

Mr. Max Lick, of Meadville, here entertained the convention with a very pleasing tenor solo, which was so well received that he responded to an enthusiastic encore. He was accompanied by Miss Graham.

President Srodes here introduced Mr. F. H. Nibecker, Superintendent of House of Refuge, Philadelphia, who was received with applause and addressed the convention as follows on the subject "The Delinquent Boy, His Reformation: Statistics.":

Mr. President: Coming as I do in the midst of a crowded program it would be little courtesy on my part, being one of you, If I were not willing to be very brief and give opportunity to the distinguished stranger whom we have with us, and to whom we were seemingly so discourteous this afternoon as to adjourn the session at which he was to appear.

Mr. Johnson is past master in the care of the feeble minded, and one who is familiar after long years of association in the National conferences of Charities and Corrections, in all capacities, official and advisory, with all manner of charity and charitable work. I would not deprive him of the fullest time that he may desire tonight, by speaking to you at any great length, I being one of you and he being here through his courtesy and kindness.

The question of reformation of course immediately demands of us, if we use any analythical method at all, the inquiry, what is to be reformed? I am now using the word reform in its popular sense. If we were in an afternoon session and had ample time I would like to pass slips through the audience asking, first, what is to be reformed, and after receiving the answer, thinking I might get probably the almost unanimous answer that it was character that was to be reformed, to ask you to tell me what character is. I will give you a few seconds to define it in your own minds, if you can. I know of nothing more difficult of definition, and character is what is to be reformed. We cannot say that it represents something, because we cannot reform a representation. It must be something. We cannot say that it is something in the man or in the woman, because then it is entirely independent of him and its reformation might not effect the individual. It must be, then, as I understand it, what the man is; not the man himself, but what he is.

I grant you that is not a lucid definition of character, but if you can formulate a definition of character I should be most happy to have it. Lexicographers will tell us it is a hundred and one things, but I have yet to see a clear definition. I say to you that so far as our consideration of the subject is concerned we will consider character as what the individual is.

If we are to reform this thing, character, we ought, I suppose, to know what determines it.

The aim of the age is to get at causes and to begin at foundations, and start with sources, and if we are to work with character we ought to know what it is that determines a man's character. I venture to say, first, that it is the physical constitution with which he is born. I do not speak of heredity, because if I say heredity there will be at once a natural turning of the mind to moral characteristics, although moral characteristics are scarcely transmissible. I speak of the physical constitution and characteristics with which the child is born. No one who has had children of his own or who has studied children in any school or Sunday school or indeed in any place where children may be studied, will have any question at all that there is a decided difference in the physical characteristics of children. I do not mean by physical characteristics such distinctions as whether the child has a long nose or a high forehead or some particular cast of features. I mean the physical constitutional characteristics with which he is born. Whether he is nervous, or phlegmatic; whether he is full of physical exhuberance, or reserved and non-expressive; and I believe these things have more to do with what a child becomes in after life than is ordinarily attributed to them.

I was going up to the college the other day and the schools were just being dismissed, and if I could have had the children as they passed me for an exhibit here, acting as they were, I don't think it would have been necessary for me to have said as much as I have concerning the difference in the physical characteristics of children.

The next thing that enters into making the child what he is, or into his character, is his physical habits. We are accustomed to think of habits as things formed of choice and will; done because we like to do them, and we do them so often that we do them without any distinct regard to moral quality. They become automatic. There are physical habits formed in childhood with which the mind has practically nothing to do. I will take extreme examples. Take the habit of cleanliness in the child. One can hardly question that the habit of cleanliness or the lack of it may be formed in early childhood without any volition on the part of the child. If we take the extreme illustration of the foreigners who in the autumn sew on their clothes for the winter, I wouldn't think there would be any need of further illustration; but we go further and say that the physical habit of the quality of speech, of profanity and obscenity that is formed in early childhood is formed without any reference to moral standards or moral quality, any more than is the case in the boy saying "father" or "mother." There are physical impurities indulged in early childhood that are purely physical in themselves and yet have the greatest influence on the character in after life. They wear grooves in the mind, through which there will course through the whole life a continually foul stream, unless there is something to change its course.

Then, again, as a third forming cause of character there is the ultimate idea, the determining idea of one's life. Of course this is not consciously formed in early childhood, but it is formed in a rudimentary way, and every child has sooner or later, if he is intelligent, some idea of what his end and aim is to be in life. Of course that is stamping itself upon his mind in very early life and before his character is fully crystalized.

Lastly, I would say the determination of the means by which the end of this ruling idea should be accomplished is an important matter. The purpose in life may be all right, in itself, and yet the determination of the means by which that purpose shall be accomplished may make the character for good or bad. For instance, if a young man should determine that he wanted to be possessed of five thousand dollars and should break into your bank to get it, it would be a very different matter from the man who determined that he wanted five thousand dollars and went to work in a mine to get it, saving a dollar a week, or a professional man who determined that he needed five thousand dollars and by some remarkable case of surgery or some great case at law should make it. The determination of all these men would be the same, but the determination of the means would decide the moral quality. Therefore, the choice of the means by which the end shall be attained in life is as important in determining the character as the end chosen.

If these facts are a not too scientific analysis of what makes character then when we want to reform (for I question the reformation of character in the ordinary popular sense, but do recognize the possibility of reformation of character that shall replace character already existing) character, and these are the causes of character, how shall we go about it? Can we do anything with physical constitution and characteristics that are the first basis of every man's character? I say no. We cannot make a live, pushing man out of a logy, phlegmatic one, whose blood flows slowly and whose nerves are buried deep and whose brain acts sluggishly in any mental operation. It is not the reformation then of his natural characteristics, although it is an attempt that is often made as a basis of reformation. Some would make all children alike and make all do alike with the same earnestness, but the effort is absolutely useless. If that is the basis of the effort it will fail. It is positively doomed to fail before it begins. And that is one of the things at the basis of character that must be allowed to stay as it is, and therefore many of the efforts at reformation are exceedingly faulty, because they do not recognize that here is one thing that they have to deal with from which they must keep their hands off.

If we cannot do anything with that first basis of a man's character what shall we say about the physical habits? It is the easiest thing in the world to reform a physical habit; as easy as it is to teach children to write. A person comes into a school and looks at a boy's writing; he has had little training, and the observer wonders at its goodness. It is the easiest thing in the world to teach. It is as easy to reform physical habits. All you have to do is to not give the physical habit a chance to assert itself. You may plant a bulb or a seed in the ground, and if you will keep the leaves cut off for a little while the seed or bulb will die. It is the same with reference to a physical habit; remove the opportunity for its indulgence and the habit is gone. What is required for this is continuous close oversight. That is an organized effort, such as is exercised in boarding schools, where an individual effort such as is possible in the family, cannot succeed. There is the constant keeping down of the foliage; whereas in the family it cannot be cut down all the time. I am not criticising the family, or the putting of children in families. Constant oversight will kill it any time. While that habit is dying another one is being formed, and being formed under proper supervision and oversight it is presumably a proper physical habit.

There is a great deal in even physical forms. I have no doubt many of you would feel more like prayer when kneeling at the home or before the altar in your church than you would here on your seats before me. The mere doing of the deed will teach the doctrine; and so it is with a physical habit the mere formation of a proper physical habit will naturally react on the making of the man what he is—the character.

The next matter I spoke of was the ruling purpose of the boy's life. Now this is not so simple. I perhaps will run counter to the thought of many of you when I say that probably the most defective way of changing the dominant idea of the boy's life is by preachment, indoctrination; talking about what the proper idea should be. If we have a very strong notion and somebody puts at us something entirely opposite, our combativeness is excited and we oppose it because it is different from what we have; if, however, someone can lay before us a proposition or panorama of life that throws our strong idea into a hideous light and makes it appear something to be shunned we will sneak away from it; but we do not care to have anyone tell us about it; we would rather they wouldn't refer to what we believe. The worst thing you can do to a public man is to quote his previous speeches to him, and the worst thing you can do to a man who is living an upright life is to refer to something that he did in another phase of living. Preachment is the least effective way of changing the purpose of a boy's life; it must be done by indirection; by showing that another purpose is better; that there is something higher or better, but don't try, with most men, or any boy, to bring him to the stage where he ought to do it because it is the right thing to do. I never heard a more ridiculous story than of a man who was proverbial for making absurd claims for boys in his school; he told about a boy whom some official was talking to and asked "what are you here for?" and he told him that he was there for going to church before the bell rang and the man said, "what do you stay here for if you didn't do anything, why don't you run away?" and the boy said, "it wouldn't be right." Now that is the consummation of absurdity, and if you expect to eliminate selfishness from a child's aim in life you are expecting more than most of you have expected of your own children in their bringing up. In fact I don't know of anybody who isn't following a selfish aim in life. Do men get rich because they can do so much good with their money? Do men seek power because it will give them such great influence for good to others? Where can you find an unselfish motive in life? Men are called upon to repent, so they may go to heaven, or that they may escape hell, by the men of the new as well as the old school of evangelists. Then don't try to demand from the child an unselfish motive as the dominant idea of his life; because nobody lives without selfish motive in life. But if that motive is made so free from objectionable individualism that a man stands as well as the rest of us in community and recognizes the rights of other men in community it is high enough. And that brings me naturally to the last source of character to the means by which these motives shall be accomplished. Here is where selfishness will get its proper baptism of righteousness, by teaching of the life that no boy can live to himself; that he is a part of the social system; that he depends on others and others have their rights and he has his rights and others must recognize them. The boy may be reformed from the predatory animal, with selfishness of the most savage kind into the social being that recognizes that others have rights as well as himself and he has rights as well as others and only in the same proportion. Then you have made of him a very fair character, if his aim and end in life is a persistent although partial aim for that which is acceptably good.

That is what I think should be the basis of the work of the reformation of the boy. It sounds a little dry, but we have to get down to the foundation when we are going to do anything with an absolute hope of accomplishing a purpose. By such an analysis we get a little idea of what the work we are trying to do aims to accomplish. It aims to lift by replacing the character already half formed by another character that shall be the social character that can succeed in the world alongside of the character of other men, without conflicting with them in the exercise of their rights.

Details of the efforts put forth are not in place here. There is tacked on to this suggestion the word "statistics." It is said that figures don't lie. Someone else has also said that liars do figure. That is about what I think of statistics. It depends on who makes them, and the point of view taken of the things of which they are made. Of statistics concerning matters of this kind I have comparatively little regard. We make statistics on the results of our work, we visit the boys for three years until they are 18 years old and charge ourselves with every complaint against them, and every boy that goes to another institution, etc., and try to get a fair idea of what our work amounts to; but if it looked a thousand times blacker than it does we should keep on doing it, because we think it is the right kind of an effort to make. Concerning the result of those lives in which we have interfered I can say we have had no year that the percentage of the boys on our visiting list who are doing well has been below 80. Leading decent lives. I don't think that four-fifths of them will perhaps hold fast all their lives. If there are many young people here I would be also unwilling to assume the same thing for them, in their lives. The only thing we can say is that the boy has been reformed to the extent that he has been placed on his feet, and made able to stand there for a considerable period of time. It rests with society, largely, as to what will become of him afterwards. When the spirit of viciousness and crime and evil becomes so rampant that the best of children are being contaminated and destroyed I don't know why I should expect that my pupils should escape the contagion any more than others. When the social neglect is so great that child-crime increases by leaps and bounds, so that where there were hundreds of cases a few years ago there are thousands now, I don't know why I should expect that children who have been schooled by me should get out of it any better than those who have been to the public or private schools in the cities where they live.

Statistics simply show that more than four-fifths of the children taken in hand at a proper time in life and under proper conditions may be placed on their feet and then kept there for a considerable time, and then it is for the public to say whether they will destroy what others have formed. (Applause.)

Following Mr. Nibecker's address Mrs. E. S. Lindsey of Warren, read the following interesting paper, "Child Labor and Its Results," which was received with applause.

CHILD LABOR AND ITS RESULTS.

By Mrs. E. S. Lindsey,

Those of you who have read Hardy's novel, "Jude the Obscure," will recall with a pang of quaint personality of the little Jude, or as he was grotesquely called, "Father Time." The child, saddened and prematurely aged by privition and suffering asks, "Can't I do anything?" "No," answers the mothers, "all is trouble, adversity and suffering." Again the childish voice inquires, "Mother, it would be better out of the world than in it." "Yes, dear, it would, almost." "But we don't ask to be born," the boy says pitiously.

The next morning the little Jude, having destroyed the two younger children, hangs himself. In the stiffened fingers was found a bit of paper on which was written in the boy's hand, "Done because we are too many."

To those of us who have come in close personal contact with these miniature men and women into whose haggard little faces no gleam of youth or laughter ever comes, this story, horrible as it is, is written the realms of possibility. Across the door of the crowded, stifling tenement the explanation of crime and degeneracy might well read, "Done because we are too many."

John Spargo in his pathetic history, "Childhood's Wrongs; The Bitter Cry of the Children," asserts that there is no more horrible page in all history than the enslavement of mere babies by the industrial revolution of the eighteenth century in England. At first parental love and pride were in arms against the new system. Factory girl was a disgraceful epithet. Not till forced by lowered wages and abject poverty could the respectable classes be induced to send their children to the factories. But the great manufacturies must have children. What simpler than get them from the workhouses? Surely it would not be a difficult task to persuade officials to get rid of their pauper children and to the conscientious few who sought to investigate there was always the specious pretext that the children were merely taken from the poor houses to become apprentices and be taught good trades, and thus was established the traffic in child slaves. They received no wages, were confined in dark cellars, often chained to keep them from running away, beaten and tortured, worked sixteen hours on a stretch, indiscriminately herded together and fighting with pigs for the coarse fare which they shared in common. When we think of the intelligent care and tenderness shown our feeble minded in a model institution like Polk, we are filled with horror when we read that the overseers of the poor demanded that the manufacturers must accept one imbecile out of every batch of twenty children. Robert Owen says children were received as early as six years of age. They worked steadily from six in the morning till seven in the evening and after that were supposed to be educated. One wonders how British philanthropists could have had so much time to devote to the emancipation of the poor negro of our southern states. The first act passed through parliament for the protection of children was due to the efforts of Sir Robert Peel. This act placed no limit upon the age at which children might be employed, but graciously reduced the working day to twelve hours and sought to provide clothes, religious training and education.

Yes, but you will say, thank God that dark chapter is finished and in the light of the great philanthropy of the twentieth century with its ringing plea for the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God former things have passed away, and yet children only four years old have been found in your canning factories in New York State and little girls of five and six are working by night in your southern cotton mills.

The Greek legend tells us as fast as Saturns children were born he swallowed them. Modern greed and industry is performing this somewhat doubtful role for every state in our Union.

A competent authority places the number of children under fourteen in the Southern cotton mills as 60,000.

It is hard for us as loyal Pennsylvanians to accept the fact that our state enslaves more children than any other—principally as breaker boys. The work is hard, and bending over the chute to pick out slate and refuse from the coal results in deformed bodies, while the choking clouds of dust lay the foundation of the dreaded miners' consumption. Wages are from 50 to 60 cents a day.

To again quote from John Spargo: "Children are employed in the textile mills because their labor is cheaper than that of adults. Boys are employed in the glass factories at night because their labor is cheaper than that of machinery. Children in tenements paste the fancy boxes in which we get our candies for the same reason. Such child labor has nothing to do with training the child for the work of life."

And now as to the physical condition. In European countries, where more careful investigations have been conducted, the victim of the workshops or factory shows great physical deterioration, consumption and rickets being perhaps the most prevalent diseases. Choking clouds of dust, overheated rooms and in some manufactories as in that of felt hats, where it is necessary to keep the atmosphere very moist, the work is continued until faintings are so numerous that it does not pay to keep going, and the mills are closed. In our large carpet factories children become so thoroughly dyed themselves that a scratch or cut often results in death.

I have never forgotten a child in whom I became deeply interested in a New York children's hospital suffering from necrosis of the jaw. This terrible disease was brought on by making matches and was due to phosphor poisoning. Spargo says it is known as "phossy jaw." Examples might be multiplied, but they are too horrible. That the sum of these wrongs should be a low moral standard is not to be wondered at. I once had pointed out to me the most evil woman in a great mill. She was not sixteen at the time and was a veritable power for evil, contaminating all her associates. She had worked since she was five years old.

The following clipping from a Harrisburg paper furnishes us with the other side of the argument, as presented by State Factory Inspector Delaney:

"Thousands of children run wild, says Delaney—Blames it on anti- child labor faddists who killed legislation.

"Harrisburg, September 11.—'The faddists and anti-child labor people in Philadelphia, who defeated beneficial legislation last winter, sowed the wind and are now reaping the whirlwind,' said State Factory Inspector Delancy to-day.

" 'They complained,' said Captain Delaney, 'that children instead of being employed in factories ought to be sent to school. As a general proposition I agreed to that, but stipulated that they might be employed when there was no school, to which they objected and the legislation fell. What it the result?

" 'Look at Philadelphia to-day. When schools opened this week it was found that 10,000 children could only be accommodated with half a day's schooling and over 13,000 had no accommodations whatever, and were forced into the streets. What is to become of these 13,000 children? Under the laws, as created by the anti-child labor faddists, these children are not permitted to go into the factories to work, they are not even permitted to do the lightest kind of labor. They must simply remain idle and run wild through the streets.

" 'And matters might even be worse,' continued Captain Delaney. 'The anti-child labor people successfully opposed the allowing of principals and teachers in parochial schools to issue certificates to children, compelling them to go to public school teachers for authority to issue certificates. Now, here is a supposition case based on that action:

"'Suppose the 70,000 children attending the Catholic parochial schools of Philadelphia should be turned over to the Philadelphia school authorities, what a wretched and deplorable condition they would be in. The public schools there are now shy of accommodations for 13,000, and if the 70,000 Catholic children now in the parochial schools were turned over to the public school authorities, that would make 80,000 children without school accommodations. There are Episcopal and Lutheran parochial schools in Philadelphia, the scholars in which would swell the number to about 100,000. In other words, if the parochial schools were closed and the public schools were asked to take charge of the children whose parents pay taxes, they simply could not do it, and this vast army of children would be running idle in Philadelphia's streets. They could not work—the faddists on child labor have barred them out. What could they do? Nothing—simply run wild. The conditions are deplorable. What would you do with these children if these parochial schools, which are now supported exclusively by private subscription, were to be closed? That's the conundrum.'

"Captain Delaney, in his report published some time ago, called attention to this condition of affairs, and prophesied what would certainly happen."

But the pendulum swings far out with the first stroke of early legislation on any subject, reminds one of Evan's definition of a musical person: "One who has strength enough to make a terrible noise and obtuseness enough not to mind it.

It seems to me that the good people are overlooking one simple factor in the problem—the child's own feeling in the matter. I never heard a great scientist yet who could either measure or explain a boy's appetite. My homely statement of this problem would read: The unemployed boy might receive as his share of the family rations one bologna and a piece of bread, which would be lost in a corner of his poor little empty stomach. While the small laborer might be able to lay six sausages side by side with bread ad libitum. If we enact arbitrary laws prohibiting absolutely all work for the children of our poor, then we should be prepared to satisfy the needs which the poor wages of the parents cannot cover.

Children early show an interest in work and a delight and pride in wages. I believe the golden mean will yet be reached when the state shall offer and enforce such a fine protection that child labor shall neither mean deformed bodies or dwarfed brains. The problem of the unemployed faced us this summer in Warren with some lively lads who had nothing to do. While waiting for good homes two exciting runaways were the result, and the picture of a long-suffering county commissioner dashing up our state road, while the Children's Aid ladies looked under beds and in closets, is still more than vivid in my mind. One small delinquent in explaining said with a fine despair: "You see, Mrs. Lindsey, we had nothing else to do."

It does not seem to me that moderate labor on a full stomach can be any more injurious to the child than long hours of study on an empty stomach, and yet you have the testimony of hundreds of our teachers in the poor districts of our large cities that a large number of children have no breakfasts whatever and a cup of coffee without even bread in other instances. Hannah Moore said there are only two bad things in the world, sin and bile; and yet with this condition you are sure to have both.

I wish this vast subject had been given to one capable of grasping it, but I comfort myself and you with that charming couplet:

Great Junos geese saved Rome her citadel,
And the State may be saved if I but cackle well.

After the reading of Mrs. Lindsey's paper the convention was entertained by the singing of a solo by Mr. Griffith, accompanied by Miss Graham, which was greatly enjoyed by all.

President Srodes here introduced to the convention Mr. Alexander Johnson, General Secretary National Conference and Charities, and said: I am pleased that we can receive this evening the experience and knowledge of one who has been in the work so long a time and who is able by that experience to give us the benefit of his advice. Mr. Alexander Johnson, Secretary to the National Conference of Charities and Corrections of the State of Indiana, is present and I take pleasure in presenting him to you.

Mr. Johnson was received with applause and spoke as follows, his subject being, "Our Charities, and Philanthropy of the United States."

OUR CHARITIES, AND PHILANTHROPY OF THE UNITED STATES.
By Mr. Alexander Johnson.

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen:

I am to speak to you to-night, by the will of your program committee, on the value of conferences of charities and the relations which should subsist between the state and national conferences, as well as on the topic named by the chair.

This is your thirty-third conference. We had in June in Minneapolis the thirty-fourth national conference. If the state conferences are the daughters of the national conference, this is the oldest daughter. I have known a good deal about this conference. Your friend and associate, Mr. McGonnigle, now deceased, was an intimate friend of mine, and we often talked about this conference. I promised him that some day I would come and spend a day with you. I have frequently read your annual reports. I have them in my library and find in them many valuable contributions to the literature of charity and reform.

When we think of what the national conference has meant to the nation in its 34 years of useful life, we may see what the state conference has been to Pennsylvania. You are a generation old now. For a third of a century you have been coming together to inquire how your work might be done better; how the taxpayers' burdens might be lightened, or how the money they furnish might be spent to greater usefulness.

I want to point out one or two things that the conference ought to be to the state. First in importance is the function it performs as a sort of stock taking. Every business man takes account of his stock, and of his debts, every year, and he finds in that way how he stands. This is your stock taking. How is this great work, this most important business that the state has to do, being done? This business that is put into your hands as dealers with the people who are in danger of becoming undesirable citizens, or who have already become such? Can we say we have had a good year; that there are fewer people in the almshouses and fewer dependent children to be taken care of and fewer insane and idiotic and deaf mutes and blind? Can we say we have improved our methods so that we are turning out a better product from our social factory in which the thing to be manufactured is worthy intelligent citizens?

We have many of these institutions, intended to make over and rehabilitate those who have fallen or those who are in danger of falling. Brother Nibecker's institution is the best known type of such. Taking into it boys who have had no proper chance; boys who have done some bad things. (Judge Lindsey says there isn't such a thing in the world as a bad boy, but that boys sometimes do bad things.) To take those boys and turn them out as ordinarily good citizens; can you imagine a piece of business that the state is doing that is of more importance than that; more important than even the teaching in the great schools and colleges. I think the work your President is doing for the insane, the work my dear friend Murdock is doing for the feeble-minded, is a blessed and sacred work, because it is work for humanity. Whether it is for the defective, or the poor or for the delinquent, this work that we have is all one piece of work Charities and corrections are two sides of one great movement, and the purpose of it all is to uplift humanity, and if Providence has been so good as to make that our life work we are very fortunate to have so great a privilege. Now, besides taking stock of our success or failue in the business which our state gives us to do for her, there is another very valuable function of the annual conference. When we meet together we should not only inquire how we are getting along, but also as to the spirit in which this work is being done. That spirit we have a greater opportunity to enkindle at these meetings than anywhere else. Are we getting hold of the public and making them understand our spirit? If we can get the general public to come to our meetings and realize the spirit in which we are doing this work it is a great advantage. It is not enough that the Governor and Members of the Legislature should approve of our work. Public work, to be out of the danger of politics must have a strong support in public opinion, and when we come together in a public way and get the public interested it is a great thing to do. We want public opinion to look at these matters as we look at them.

One thing we may say about our American charities that cannot be said of these of many parts of the world. Most of the improvements, not only in our charitable but in our penal affairs, come from the inside, and are not forced on the agents or officers by the pressure of outside public opinion. Now it is true that when we put a man into office, especially if he thinks he is settled there, the tendency is to get into a routine and do the same thing over ond over. But still our American Charities have that distinguishing mark, more than in any other country, that the improvements you see in them from year to year largely come from the inside and are not forced on them from the outside; and that it comes because we have this habit in America of seeking for public sentiment and sympathy. Here every man owns the state. One undivided five millionth part of Pennsylvania is owned by each voter present, and so he takes or ought to take a very intelligent interest in it. The work of the state goes forward in that way because it is the public work, and the public are advised.

I must confess that this latter statement often seems contrary to events, that often the public are strangely indifferent to their own welfare, their own affairs. Yet in spite of that I still believe that in the majority of cases the public do care and only need, perhaps, to know a little more than they do, to take a more active part for better things. You say that it is a very rosy view, things are getting done in the dark, occasionally. Some dreadful story comes out in some other state. In your neighboring state on the west a few weeks ago two men were sent to prison for murdering an insane patient, and in another state two women were accused of putting a feeble minded girl, for punishment, into a hot bath until it scalded her until she died. There are almshouses where people are dreadfully neglected: where active cruelty is going on; but they are all in dark places. The dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty. That is what the scripture says about it.

The thing we should welcome, as public servants, is that the public shall come and see us and know what is going on, and when the broad sunlight of publicity is blazing full and clear into every corner of our institutions those things will not occur. Cruelty and filth flee before the light, like those little crawling things that skirmish away, when you turn up a board that has long been lying on the grass. And then the general public has another great duty. The newspapers are very prone to publish the bad things. If a man has done something wrong they are not afraid to tell it. Now won't you agree with me that there is another side to that question? Here is a man who day after day and month after month is doing his whole duty with a great deal of self sacrifice and for small pay; isn't it a good thing to go to him and say "we are with you; you can count upon us every time; we are glad to see things looking so well." Let something good be said. I wonder if you remember the story in one of the early gospels, that has been thrown aside. How Jesus with his disciples was walking along the streets of Jerusalem, and the dead body of a poor wretched dog was lying in the street, and everyone said, "what a dreadful sight." But though the body was festering and repulsive yet his white teeth were shown, and Jesus said, "What beautiful white teeth." There is always something good that might be said. Say it as well as the other. We want to let our public servants know that we appreciate them when they do the right thing, as well as to make it very plain that if they do not do the right thing we shall not stand by them and they will not be kept in their place.

I don't think anything good has been said about Charities and Corrections in the world that cannot be said about Charities and Corrections in the United States. I think also that perhaps nothing bad has been said that cannot be truthfully said about the world in some place of the United States. The great purpose of the national conference and of the state conference, is to tell the truth, to speak out clearly in praise of the good that all may emulate it, in condemnation of the evil that all may shun it and those to blame may reform it. The great object of these conferences is to provoke one another to love and good works, as the apostle puts it. That we may have things done better and better.

We go to extremes. The pendulum swings far beyond the center. So it is in our affairs. We go very far one way and a little too far the other way. But every time the pendulum has swung a little too far perhaps it has helped the general average. Even those spasms of reform that occur in the great cities one in six or eight or ten years, with almost the regularity of panics and crises, those great upheavals, evanescent though they may be, are movements in the line of permanent reform and something is gained here and there. Occasionally we hear of things that seem like a set back; of the increase in child criminality, for instance, which has been mentioned this evening. Now I have a profound distrust of statistics, (I have compiled and published a good many of them myself,) and I doubt very much, that there is this tremendous increase in juvenile crime.

It may be true there are more arrests. This is true about all kinds of arrests. We are perpetually creating new crimes. It is a crime now to steal an electric current from a wire. Before there were any electric wires that crime did not exist. In the border parts of the country murders are not always a matter of record, but as we become civilized, there are more records of murder, but I doubt if there is any more murder. I am sure there is less drunkenness than there used to be, although many more arrests for drunkenness are made. So we cannot say off hand that this and that are so, because statistics prove it to be so. But that doesn't mean that we are not bound to know whether or not we are doing the right thing. It doesn't mean, for instance, that a Childrens' Aid Society isn't bound by every consideration of honor and square dealing with the world at large, to know what happens to all their children; to follow them up and be able to say, "we are doing the right work, and we can prove it because we know where all our children are." That is one of the tests we have a right to put to an institution or society. Brother Nibecker follows his boys for three years after they are discharged. I don't know but it ought to be until they are twenty-one. We have a right to say to the societies and agents, "What are your results. How careful are you to find that you achieve those results. Is your work founded on sentiment, or sense. Are you doing the work, or talking about it," and this is a splendid place to ask and answer those questions. And if we tell the rugged and true facts even if they hurt sometimes, we shall get tremendous good from these conferences, and the benefit will be to the whole state. Of recent years a great conception has been growing in our minds with regard to the social order.

What is this society, of which you and I are individual members? It is not a mere aggregation of people. It is not a mere organization; but in a true and high sense it is a living organism of which everyone of us is a part, just as each part of the human body is a part of the whole body; as each cell in the brain is a part of that one live organism, and connected by infinite numbers of filaments to each other so that one cannot be affected by itself. Just as in the human body, if one limb is wounded, the whole body is injured; just as the head, or heart, or viscera, cannot be sick by themselves, but the whole body is affected. So with this human organism, the poorest and weakest member cannot suffer or be abused but that you and I and everyone of us to some extent suffer and are abused. That is the view of human society we are getting to see, and that is why we are insisting that every poor brother and sister of ours shall have the best they can of life. The whole state must rise to a healthy condition; and that can only be done when every individual member rises, whether those reared under circumstances like you and I, or those whom our prosperity has invited and our inducements have brought from across the sea; they are all members of this human organism and they all suffer, and fall and rise together. We try to bring everyone to a realization of that tremendous fact. That is what the great national conference means, with much else of meaning.

We ask you to do as you have done before and send some representative who will come to the national conference next May, at Richmond, Va. Many of you have heard the words "On to Richmond." We are going to Richmond with a better purpose now than when those words were uttered. We are going now to carry the conquests of peace and love, instead of war; and they will welcome us from the north much more heartily than they welcomed us some forty years ago.

Miss Donner here presented the report of the Boys' Industrial Home of Western Pennsylvania, at Oakdale, for the year ending October 1, 1907, as follows:

REPORT OF BOYS' INDUSTRIAL HOME OF WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA, AT OAKDALE.

The home is located at Oakdale, Pa., just fifteen miles west of Pittsburg Union Station. The main building is a large three story building containing officers departments, bakery, laundry, dormitories, etc. Another large building on the north side of this contains the gymnasium, one school room and shop. The greenhouse is on the south side.

The farm is one mile from Oakdale. The new farm house is heated and lighted by gas from the well on the farm, with hot and cold water and two bath rooms. It has all the modern conveniences of a city home. The farm manager is Mr. E. C. Mowry; matron, Miss M. Stewart. The matron of the home is Mrs. E. J. Dunlap.

The school was kept up through the year, and the work done will compare favorably with the work of schools in general. Teachers, Miss Mary F. Peters, Miss Richards and Miss L. C. Donnan. The greenhouse and garden are in charge of Mr. Pasco and are a source of enjoyment, profit, and instruction to the boys. The laundry and bakery have been running full time. In both of them the boys work and receive practical instruction in those industries. Manual training was carried on through the year, each boy getting one and one-half hours instruction each day. Chairs, tables, and other pieces of wood work are on exhibition at the Pittsburg Exposition.

The farm consists of one hunderd and fifty acres and has good buildings and abundant water. This season we raised 400 bushels of oats, 275 bushels of wheat, 60 tons of hay. We have on the farm 5 horses, 15 cows, hogs, chickens, ducks, turkeys and rabbits. The farm furnishes us with milk, butter, eggs, and vegetables of all kinds for the table and will soon furnish an abundance of fruit. The boys all like the farm and we have 29 there now. Visitors to the farm frequently remark, "how much better this is for boys than the streets of the city!"

During the year ending Sept. 30, 1907, there were under our care for a longer or shorter time 230 boys.

These boys were received as follows:

Through friends	106
Juvenile Court, All'y and other counties, (homeless and neglected boys)	78
Humanes Society	16
Children's Aid Society	11
Other Institutions	11
Church and Charity Workers	8
Total	230

Since the work began, seven years ago, we have had under our care, for a longer or shorter time, 748 boys. We have never had a death among them, very little sickness and no contagious diseases.

Mrs. Sue Willard read the following report of the Industrial School for Girls, Indiana county:

REPORT OF INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, INDIANA, PA.

As this year (1907) closes the first decade of our school, a review of our work covering the first ten years may be of interest to this convention.

Many things came to pass in the ten years, and yet at the end of them it seems as if time had flown very swiftly. Young people have grown to manhood and womanhood, have grown happy or sad, good or bad. Lives have begun and lives have ended. Fortunes and reputations have been made and lost, and, yet we say, with sudden wonder, can it be ten years since then, really ten years since the C. A. S. of Western Pennsylvania saw the beginning of their long cherished plan of a home, where "our girls" could receive the training that can be had only in the family life of a true home?

At our annual meeting in Oil City, in 1897, we decided to launch out, and a committee of three were appointed to secure a location. Of two places under consideration, Indiana was chosen. A home bought for $5,000 entirely on faith, and in five years our faith was rewarded, and our property clear of debt. But, the first two years witnessed many discouragements and dark days. I well remember sitting for days in that empty house waiting for donations and pupils, which did not materialize. But, soon the people learned more of the motive and object of the work, they rose to the occasion, and contributed liberally. From this beginning we are now, at the end of ten years, in possession of a comfortably furnished and equipped home, containing eighteen comfortable beds, bath room, laundry, a pleasant dining room, convenient kitchen, comfortable sitting room and porches; also ample lawn, and large vegetable garden, from which the table is supplied with fresh vegetables, and in addition to this, through the generosity of a friend of Elk county we have our own cozy and comfortable school room, making us a property well worth $15,000, "A monument of faith."

In ten years we have sheltered and cared for 250. What class of girls, you say. I answer, those who in our judgment most need our care, for like Whitcomb Riley:

"I believe all children good
If, they are only understood.
Even bad ones 'pears to me,
Are just as good as they kin be."

Many of our girls are in good homes, where they are loved and appreciated, quite a number have graduated from our common and high schools, some are trained nurses, and some are married and in homes of their own, and are passing on to others the good practical training received in this school.

All of our girls have not always done just as we wished, or as they should have done, but, have yours? So many of these girls do not have a wise and loving mother to cover with "the mantle of Charity" all the faults and weaknesses common to all.

"She is only half a mother who does not see her own child in every child,
And her own child's griefs in every pain which makes another weep."

Some have been wayward, and have through time acknowledged the benefit of the discipline and training received. Of this large number I can recall only twelve who have gone far into sin, and of these two expressed regret on their dying bed, that they had not heeded the instruction received at the home.

Many times discouraged by what seems like failure when troubles vex and cares annoy, the flesh grows weak and we are tempted to ask, does it pay. We realize the truth of the thought in Faber's Hymn.

"Oh! it is hard to work for God,
To rise and take his part.
Upon this battlefield of life
And not sometimes lose heart."

But, if we believe that a kind deed is never lost, even the cup of cold water in his name, or that we are to sow the seed by all waters, leaving results to him who gave the command, or that he is the best neighbor who showeth mercy, if we believe, really, the teachings of the great teacher, then, we can say:

"Right is right, since God is God,
And right the day must win;
To doubt would be disloyalty,
To falter would be sin."

In the year just closed, we have received 36 new girls, at present we have 19. During the fall and early winter our school was unusually small, but, since the beginning of 1907 we have had a full school, and everything is in a good prosperous condition. The domestic department, under the efficient management of the matron, Miss Bratton, is up to its usual high standard, the girls assisting in all lines of work, even in baking. The school is in charge of a capable and experienced teacher, Miss Kinter, who's aim is to teach not only the foundation of a good common school education, but the foundation of a good moral character, as well.

Our girls are very punctual and faithful in their attendance at a single Sunday in the year. They can repeat the Lord's prayer, the commandments, the creed, and several selections from the Psalms. This being more than many old church members can do. One of our girls, fourteen (14) years old having a special talent for music, and a good start as a violin player, we have succeeded in getting her a scholarship in the "Normal Conservatory of Music" where she can have special teaching on the violin, besides attending school, for which benefit, she is expected to assist in the dining room, as a waitress.

During this year we have made many improvements, and have been at a very great expense putting in sewerage. Have had painting and papering done to the amount of ninety (90) dollars. Have added much to our furnishings in the way of rugs and a new piano, which was a donation from Mrs. Hall, of Elk county and Mr. Work, of Indiana. We have also been kindly remembered by friends at the Thanksgiving and Holiday seasons.

Our school is under the efficient and attentive care of Dr. Davis. The health of our girls has been exceptionably good, indeed it is remarkable, we have had only one death since our organization, and that one was in very ill health when she came.

As to our financial report we feel that our expenditure has been small.

AUGUSTA WALLACE, Treasurer.

Miss Elizabeth Kerr, of Philadelphia, presented the report of the Childrens' Aid Society of the state of Pennsylvania, which was received with applause, and was as follows:

REPORT OF THE WORK OF THE CHILDREN'S AID SOCIETY OF PENNSYLVANIA.

As is very widely known the plan of the Childrens' Aid Society for caring for dependent and delinquent children is by placing them individually in separate family homes, a plan which is now clearly in the foreground of modern thought for the treatment of dependent children. Fifty per cent of these children are placed in private families to board. The Society finds homes for children in private families without payment of board when the existing conditions justify such an arrangement. It clothes them, watches over them by means of frequent visiting and by reports at stated times from pastors and school teachers, and procures for each child medical aid when needed. All cases are carefully investigated before a decision of the disposition of the child is made and each child receives a thorough medical examination upon being received. Parents are not relieved of their legal responsibilities in regard to their children and are expected to pay what they can toward their support and at any time upon proving themselves worthy to control and train their children they are returned to them—others are kept under the supervision of the Society until they are adopted or become self-supporting. Children of all ages and grades are taken, it may be a foundling or deserted baby, an orphan or half orphan, but there is always one verdict, give it a chance in a good home. There is encouragement in the fact that confidence in our principle and in the manner in which we do our work is now so fully established among other child caring agencies who place their children in other ways, that we are appealed to every day by these same agencies to help in relieving them of children who in their opinion need our kind of care.

County poor boards show their confidence and appreciation by sending the Society numbers of their children. Judges of the court, probation officers, the society to protect children from cruelty, hospitals with deserted children, all recognize our efficiency and seek us as a preferred channel for the care of children. The Society seeks co-operation with child saving agencies, gives them information for temporary care and placement and advice in readjustment of family difficulties. The Society has now in its care 1356 children who are classified as follows: Orphans, half orphans, deserted, of dissolute parents, of parents unmarried, of invalid and insane parents, of cruel parents, of parents separated, of parents unable to control, vagrancy, from court, from almshouses, foundlings. The Children's Aid Society is caring for 858 boys—683 of these being white and 175 colored. They have 498 girls, of which 389 are white and 109 colored. This is an increase in the total number of children in care of 209, due largely to increased co-operation with various charitable organizations. There is a Department for Domestic Service, which placed in one year over 500 women each having one child and a number having two, thus making these women self-supporting and permitting them to keep the child under their immediate care—a happier plan for both.

After the reading of Miss Kerr's paper, upon motion, the convention adjourned until nine o'clock to-morrow morning.

HISTORY OF IMMIGRATION.

By Geo. H. Butler, of Luzerne County.

The immigration question in this country has never in the past had the attention to which its importance entitles it. It has sometimes been a scapegoat of religious and racial prejudices, and always in recent years an annual sacrifice to the God of Transportation. The causes of this indifference are not hard to see.

In the early days the people of this country were busy with other matters; the immigration was small and not especially objectionable in quality. More recently a superficial interpretation of the doctrine of the "Survival of the Fittest" has led the public to adopt an easy going optimism with regard to racial questions, for getting at this doctrine really means that those survive who are fittest for survival only, and not necessarily fittest for any other purpose. At the present time the enormous volume of immigration has attracted the attention of the public, but its conditions and effects are familiar to few.

The aboriginal inhabitants of this country can only be properly called natives. One cannot speak of immigration to a country until that country has entered upon a career of national existence. Accordingly a distinction has been made and with reason, between those who took part in building the political frame work of the thirteen colonies and of the federal union, and those who are arriving to find the United States government and its social and political institutions in working operation. The former class has been called colonists—the latter are immigrants proper.

The number of persons in this country at the date of the Revolutionary War is not accurately known. The population of New England was produced out of an immigration of about twenty thousand persons who arrived before 1640, and it overflowed into the other colonies without receiving any corresponding additions from them.

In 1750 the population of the colonies amounted to about one million, which had been produced from an original immigration of less than eighty thousand. This did not include Vermont or the territory northwest of the Ohio River.

The first records of immigration began with the year 1820, and the number of immigrants who arrived in the United States from the close of the Revolutionary War to 1820 is not certain.

The original settlers of this country were in the main Teutonic and Keltic stock. In the thirteen original states the pioneers practically all were British, Irish, Dutch, German, with a few French and Portuguese, and in this connection it should be remembered that a large proportion of the French people is Teutonic in origin. The German were Protestants from the Palatinate, where they were generally scattered, having colonized in New York, Western Pennsylvania, Maryland and Vermont. The Swedes settled upon the Delaware River. The French were Huguenots driven from home by Louis XIV., and though not numerous, were valuable addition to the colonies. The Irish were descendants of Cromwell's Army and came from the northern part of Ireland. All the early settlers had been subjects of nations which entertained a high degree of civilization and were at that time the colonizing and commercial nations of the world.

At a later period the annexation of Florida and Louisiana brought in elements of Mediterranean races, so called, but, owing to various considerations into which it is not necessary to enter here, the civilization and institutions of the British overspread these regions as well as those colonized originally by the Dutch and French and produced a substantial uniformity in institutions, habits and conditions throughout the land. This process of solidification and assimilation of the different colonies under British influence reached its consummation in the establishment of federal government. After the birth of the United States as a separate nation, colonization in the earlier sense ceased entirely. European nations could no longer send out their own citizens and from communities directly dependent upon themselves, and subject to their own jurisdiction. The immigration of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, therefore, differ widely in character from the colonies of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

The official history of immigration to the United States began in the year 1820. In that year the collectors of customs at our ports were first obliged to record the arrival of passengers by sea from foreign countries. The record included numbers, ages, sexes and occupations. Before 1856 no distinction at all was made between travelers intending to return and immigrants intending to remain.

The first marked rise in immigration took place in 1827 and 1828 followng the commercial depression in England, the most striking increases were in 1845 to 1847. These sudden movements of population were chiefly due to hard time in Europe, especially in Ireland, a cause which, with the revolution in 1848 in Germany, continued to spread until 1854, when the tide began to beat less fiercely; immigration decreasing steadily until during the first two years of the Civil War. But in 1863 a gradual increase once more set in. During the whole of this period the only immigration of importance came from Europe. In the period from 1870 to 1905 immigration increased more than twofold. Directly after 1870, the time of industrial and commercial depression began, culminating in the panic of 1873. The barometer of immigration, always sensitive to such changes in the industrial atmosphere, began to fall, though there was no rapid decrease until the panic was well under way. In 1878 it suddenly began to increase again, and in 1882 immigration reached the greatest volume of any year except 1903, 1904 and 1905.

A part of the increase in 1882 and the two subsequent years must be ascribed to the promulgation of the "May Laws" by Russia, which caused large numbers of Hebrews to emigrate. In addition to these special colonies there seems to have been a general advance all along the line of nations. One reason for this may have been the enactment by Congress of the first general immigration act, under date of August 3, 1882, and the fear that this might be a forerunner of further restrictive legislation, an apprehension which has undoubtedly spread during the last two or three years. The total high water mark for a single day seems to have been reached May 7, 1905, when twelve thousand immigrants entered New York inside of twelve hours. It is estimated that the total immigration to the United States from the close of the Revolutionary War to the year 1905 was not far from twenty-three millions—a movement of population unprecedented in history.

History from one standpoint, may be considered the history of the story of race migration and its effect. The Tartar invasion of Europe, the Roman invasion and conquest of a considerable part of three continents, the Germanic invasion of the Roman Empire, the invasion of America by the Spaniards and afterwards by the English as well as the peaceful immigration of recent times on an enormous scale, are facts of the greatest magnitude.

In general, immigration usually takes a westerly direction. This is a curious phenomenon which has never been satisfactorily explained. Exceptions have sometimes occurred for special reasons, as when the northern tribes were attracted by the wealth and power of Rome and when a large number of British emigration was drawn by the gold of Australia, and the wealth of India inspired conquest. But in the case of the Persians, Tartans, Turks, Hebrews, Spaniards, English and many others, the general direction has been westward.

The cause of migration is hard to trace in detail, but is for the most part the overgrowth of population; the need for further sustenance, more space and new opportunities, are the motives which lead the races to seek new pastures.

De Tocqueville wrote of American Immigration in 1835 "No power on earth can close upon the immigration that fertile wilderness which offers resources to all industry and a refuge from all want." Sometimes the first step in migration is war with a neighboring race. The conquest may result in unexpected expansion as was the case when the United States acquired the Philippine Islands. The recent conflict between Japan and Russia was partly due to the fact that forty million inhabitants of Japan were cooped up in a territory smaller than California and required an opportunity for expansion.

The Pilgrim Fathers who settled in New England, The Huguenots, Spaniards and French, Hebrews driven from Spain and later from Russia by the "May Laws," and the Italians from the slums of Naples are instances of individuals conquered at home.

The Pilgrims and Puritans seeking liberty and a chance to develop a new and lofty type of civilization and a religious commonwealth, produced a civilization which in spite of obvious defects has excited the admiration of mankind.

While the desire to escape from persecution and oppression operated chiefly in the earlier settlement of the United States and still operates in a few cases, there is no doubt that the chief influence effecting immigration in the recent times is the prosperity of this country. This is shown by the fact that there is a relationship between industry and commercial activity in the United States in the volume of immigration. The latter of course follows upon the former, and usually acquires a certain momentum which causes it to continue for a time after the demand for labor had diminished. The commercial activity of this country not merely induces immigrants to desire to come; it makes immigrants coming possible. Testimony taken before the industrial commission disclosed that from forty to fifty per cent of those who arrive have their passage prepaid by friends or relatives in this country, and from ten to twenty-five per cent more buy their tickets abroad with money sent to them from the United States. The money used to enable friends and relatives of immigrants already here to bring immigrants to this country must come from the latters savings, and the amount of such savings depends upon the relation of wages to the cost of living, and upon the steadiness of employment.

Knowledge of industrial conditions in this country is conveyed abroad through many channels. The most common are the newspapers and personal letters of friends or relatives.

The present law forbids transportation companies or the owners of vessels to "directly or through agents, either by writing, printing or oral solicitations, solicit, invite or encourage the immigration of any aliens into the United States except by ordinary commercial letters, circulars, advertisements or oral representations, stating the sailings of their vessels and terms and facilities of transportation therein. Nevertheless, there is no doubt that a large part of the present immigration is neither spontaneous nor normal. The number of regularly employed and paid steamship agents in Europe is enormous. Generally too, it might be said that foreign nations have been only too glad to get rid of the economic burden of their dependent and delinquent citizens. During the nineteenth century there were many instances where governments, especially municipal and local governments, adopted the plan of shipping paupers, insane and diseased persons to the United States. As the average cost of supporting dependents and delinquents in the United States is not far from $150 per capita a year, and as the cost of transporting such a person from Europe to the United States would in most cases not exceed $50, the gain to the home country adopting a policy of exporting their undesirable citizens is obvious. In Great Britain and Ireland, money raised by taxes to assist poor persons and paupers to emigrate has been permitted by the government authorities, and their report for 1886 shows over forty thousand persons had been sent out of the country, and three quarters of a million dollars expended in that way. The United States government protested from time to time against this action, and when the protests were ignored, resorted to legislation, excluding certain classes of aliens.

The right of congress to pass immigration laws is founded upon police powers of the United States. "In exercise of the police power the federal government has prevented the transportation of goods and the entry of persons considered undesirable."

The most notable acts relating to immigration are the Chinese Exclusion acts, the first of which was passed in 1882. The act of 1875 forbade the landing of persons who were undergoing a sentence for conviction in their own country for felonious crimes other than political, or whose sentence had been remitted on condition of their emigration. The act of 1882 excluded persons unable to take care of themselves without becoming public charges; and since 1891, assisted immigrants have been especially mentioned in the law, in addition to the other classes to which many of those previously assisted belonged. Thus, in addition to idiots, insane persons, epileptics, persons likely to become a public charge, professional beggars and convicts, the present law excludes "any person whose ticket or passage is paid for with the money of another, or is assisted by others to come, unless it is affirmatively and satisfactorily shown that such person does not belong to one of the foregoing excluded classes.

Racial conditions of immigration, economic and social conditions will not be taken up in this paper. The effects of immigration upon the United States presents a wide field for study and investigation. From one point of view, the history of United States is the history of the effects of European immigration. How valuable this has been in adding to the wealth and power of the country every one knows and gladly acknowledges. But when we proceed to examine some effects, especially in recent years, we are confronted with a problem which constitutes a real and menaced danger to our institutions and oruganic lives. The racial effects of immigration are more far reaching and potent than all of others. The government, the state, social industry, the political party, social and political ideals, all are concepts and conventions created by individual men, and when individuals change these change with them. Recent discoveries in biology show that in the long run heredity is far more important than environment or education, for although the latter can develop, it cannot create.

DIFFICULTIES THAT MAY BE MET IN MANAGING AN ALMSHOUSE.

By D. A. Mackin, Steward of Almshouse Retreat, Luzerne County.

It is an unalterable truism to state that "the poor we have always with us." Universal recognition of the truthfulness of the statement is co-eval with the condition itself.

The remotest historical or Biblical confirmation of this fact is unnecessary, for the observations from our own viewpoint bring the fact home to us with stern reality that "the poor we have always with us." The treatment of the subject is many sided. The moral, the physical, the sociological, the economical, the intellectual, the every other "ogical" almost within the range of an unabridged has been passed upon by writers not only peculiarly fitted for the task, but also by others whose sole aim was not the introduction of ameliorating methods so much as a desire to question the prudence of this or that method in operation. It is often easier to attack a system than to suggest a better one.

But there is another phase of the question seldom adverted to and much more seldom commented upon simply because the principal is naturally adverse to expose himself to unfavorable criticism. Reference is here particularly made to the difficulties that beset the superintendent, steward or manager when he is left alone with his own thoughts in their relation to the management of the poor.

He is well aware of the main purpose of periodic conventions of Almshouse managers held for the interchange of opinions and the transfer of observation results in their official experience.

He well knows that the reports and statistics presented at the various sessions are often of the "Pat-me-on-the back" order. No person would intimate that such reports are made with a view to deceive. They assuredly are not. What this paper wishes to emphasize is the incompleteness of such reports, not in their superficial or statistical but in their substantial bearings.

Reports, from the report standpoint, are generally encouraging, but that does not gainsay the fact that there are many little affairs in the daily life of an institution which seldom fall under the observation of or reach the ears of the official in charge.

And this leads to the question; Should superintendents of almshouses restrict the exercise of their official duties to the physical betterment of their charges and ignore or at least lay not so much stress on the bettering of the moral man?

By the moral man we do not imply morality in its statutory sense Every honorable manager is jealous of the good name of his institution and meets with flashing eye any intimation of moral remissness in those under his charge. But there is a broader, a more expansive morale which offers a rich field for cultivation and development. The composite character of the inmates reveals many diverging and converging traits in disposition and temperament.

For instance, an inmate may be noticed to manifest a lacking in manliness or a weakness in moral courage by assuming a hypocritical smile or a servilely cringing demeanor in the presence of the "Boss." Should it be within the province of the manager to try to uproot such a trait in the inmate and to supplant it with a vigorous germ which under vigilant care would develop into a manly spirit of independence capable of looking every man straight in the eye?

For instance, an inmate may slyly carry tales reflecting on the reputation of a fellow inmate. In such a case, should the manager openly rebuke such an informer or instead of passively listening to the tale-bearer should the culprit be lectured on the evil of back-biting or at least be subjected to some corrective or punitive treatment?

For instance, an inmate may be the butt of ridicule causing him the keenest mortification. In this case what steps should the superintendent take to reassure the one and crush the bullying trait in the other? Should he adopt punitive or persuasive treatment for the culprit or would it be more effective for the culprit to be made to feel and to realize the littleness of such conduct?

Many incidents of this nature do crop out in the daily life of an institution and too many of them unhappily escape the eye of the manager. As we said before, he has his own thoughts when alone with himself devising or evolving plans for the betterment of his administration and to strengthen the morale of those in his charge but he is often at a loss to know where to begin, where to end and where to draw the line.

MORNING SESSION.

Thursday, October 10, 1907.

The convention was called to order by President Srodes, as per adjournment.

The delegates were entertained with a vocal solo by Miss Frances Buzza, accompanied by Miss Graham. Miss Buzza was well received and kindly responded to an encore.

Devotional exercises were conducted by Rev. R. A. Buzza; reading of the scripture and prayer.

Col. Gould presented the following report of the committee on resolutions, which upon motion of Col. Gould, seconded by Mr. Ochse, was adopted.

The resolutions offered were as follows:

Resolved; That the thanks of the association are due and are hereby tendered to the Commissioners of Crawford County and the local committee of arrangements for their thoughtful provision for our comfort and happiness during our stay here. Their hospitality and that of the good people of Meadville merits our warmest thanks.

Resolved: That the citizens of Meadville have placed us greatly in their debt by their cordial welcome and their constantly increased interest in the proceedings of the convention and the friendly spirit they have taken in the delegates personally and in the objects we seek to attain, and to the uniform courtesy which has been uniformly shown the members of the convention; and we shall take with us most pleasant memories of this meeting and the good people of Meadville.

To Whitney Braymer personally for his watchful care in looking after the details which has rendered our work much easier, and free from annoyance and care.

To the ladies of the advisory committee of the Meadville City hospital, of which Mrs. John Dick is the president, for their hearty co-operation, which has added materially to the success of this meeting.

To the ladies of the Childrens' Aid Society of this city for the most enjoyable reception on Tuesday evening which gave us a much desired opportunity to meet so many of the good people of Meadville.

To the faculty and students of the Meadville Conservatory of Music for the most enjoyable music they so unstintingly furnished the convention, and our especial thanks are due to the following members of the faculty and students,: Prof. Harry Waithe Manville, Miss Mary Thorpe Graham, Miss Rosaline Bork, Miss Helen DeArment, Mr. Lloyd Singley, Mrs. A. L. Leberman, Mr. Max Lick, Miss Mattie Thompson, Miss Frances Buzza, Miss Daisy Gartner and Mr. Earl Griffith; and the members of the Young Northwestern Orchestra deserve our warmest thanks.

And we would especially mention the Hon. Arthur L. Bates and Miss Margaret B. Power for the very gratifying and acceptable manner in which they, on behalf of the citizens of Meadville, tendered the delegates a greeting and welcome; and to Dr. T. L. Flood for his many efforts to make the delegates glad to be here and especially for the acceptable manner in which he presided at the informal reception.

That to the several newspapers of Meadville and their representatives are due and we hereby tender to them our unbounded thanks for extended, fair and impartial reports of the proceedings of this convention which they have given.

That we extend to the superintendent of the Crawford county home and to his esteemable wife our high appreciation of the efforts made by them for our enjoyment while at the home. And we wish to congratulate them and the county commissioners; also all the people of Crawford county on the excellent condition of the buildings and grounds, and the highly commendable manner in which the home is conducted.

That the thanks of this convention are due and are hereby tendered to the program committee and to Mr. Colborn personally, for the excellent program arranged for this convention. And to our esteemed president, Dr. J. Lewis Srodes for the intelligent, dignified and satisfactory manner in which he has presided and conducted the deliberations of this convention.

Resolved: That the Presdent-elect of this association is hereby authorzed to appoint the standing committees of the association for the ensuing year, including the program committee, and he is hereby authorized to appoint two delegates to the next annual meeting of the National Conference of Charities and Correction of which he shall be one if he can attend. Also, that the President-elect and the local committee of arrangements are authorized to fix the date of the next convention.

President Srodes: I was expected to make a report on the National Conference of Charities and Corrections. I would like to say that I went to Minneapolis and attended the conference. At the first meeting there was not less than 3,000 present. The first speaker was Senator Beveridge, of Indiana, whom we hoped to have here. He gave an address on child labor. Secretary Taft was also in attendance at at convention, and as he is a little bit of a fellow like myself, when we met he asked Mr. Colburn and myself what we were there for, charity or correction. (Laughter.) He also gave us an address. I am glad to say that the majority of the time of the conference was taken up with the consideration of children. The idea prevails throughout the West, I think more than in the East, that the children make the state. They are working with that idea.

Caring for the children and trusting to the future to care for the state. I think it would be profitable to the members of this association so far as possible to attend the next annual conference at Richmond, Va,. and if you cannot attend then procure a copy of the proceedings of the conference. You will get a great deal of information in that way.

Mrs. E. S. Lindsey was here called upon to open the discussion on Work of the Association.

Mrs. Lindsey: Mr. Hagburg is here and I would be glad to have him speak.

Mr. Hagburg (Warren): I havn't much to say. I was to talk upon relief during epidemics. The legislature passed a law last winter providing that all persons put under quarantine should be taken care of by the director of the poor and considered as poor persons and entitled to relief. We had quite a time about this matter in our county before this law was passed. We had several epidemics and the custom was to extend aid to everyone who was under quarantine, but as the cases became more frequent we considered that it wasn't just that the poor directors be called upon to pay bills that were contracted by other parties. We had nothing to say about the expenses, and in one instance we refused to pay. It was proven that the man was able to take care of himself before he was put under quarantine, and that he immediately afterwards took up his regular duties and again took care of his family, and the court held that under such conditions he wasn't a proper person to receive aid from the directors of the poor, and since this we have refused to extend aid to such families. Of course, if the parties were regular charges of the county before they were put under quarantine we took care of them. But now this law is passed and we will have to take care of them under the law. I thank you for the good time we have had here.

Mrs. Lindsey (Warren): In speaking of subjects for the next convention a matter has been brought strongly to my mind and that is the absolute necessity of at least an isolation ward, if you cannot have a pavilion, for tubercular cases at the almshouses. It seems to me almost criminally wrong to put a case of tuberculosis in a crowded ward with old people and people who are partially imbecile, and expose them all to that dread disease. It is a menace also to those having charge of the patients. I think Dr. Srodes will bear me out in the statement that many cases of tuberculosis taken at the start and given proper conditions of fresh air and an outdoor life can be cured.

President Srodes: This is a timely suggestion and ought to prove a good opportunity for an excellent address at the next convention. The feasibility of placing tubercular patients under the very best surroundings isn't as difficult as might be supposed. There is but one feature that makes it difficult and that is the opposition that comes from the patients themselves. It is quite common for them to object to being alone. They cannot be blamed for that, but nevertheless they must be taught that they have an affliction and that while sympathy is with them that they ought to return a certain amount of sympathy to the community. A person should not subject another to the ravages of tuberculosis any more than you ought to place a rattlesnake within reach of a child. It is just as dangerous and the suffering is greater, and the remedy, so far as the community is concerned, is so very simple, from the patient's standpoint. Small pavilions provide the patients with all that sunlight and pure air can do for them, and removes them from the other patients. As to the insane you also have to take into consideration their mental state. I would suggest that in the preparation of papers they do not stop at half-way measures. Don't hesitate. Let us get at this thing right. If you have to expend a little more money to care for these patients it will be economy in the future and will bring results that we can get in no other way.

Whitney Braymer: At the last session of the legislature did they not pass a law and make an appropriation for two camps or hospitals for the treatment of tuberculosis?

Col. Gould: They made an appropriation of $600,000.

Mr. Braymer: I understand one is in Adams County and the other in the north part of the state somewhere. It is a question that as a member of the board of this county gives us much concern. We had a woman patient and didn't want to take her in because we are not provided for that class, but we finally had to; but we put her in a room by herself and had her cared for by a nurse, away from the other patients. The legislature it seems did have a little time to consider this question. Someone of them happened to think we had some poor in the state, and they got in one or two bills; but most of the time of the last legislature was taken up in providing for game and fish laws on weasels and minks. It would make our work easier if we had plain laws on the statute books, not so mixed that we had to go to Philadelphia or Erie to get a lawyer to explain them. (Laughter.)

The chair here appointed Mr. Ochse and Col. Gould a committee to conduct the President-elect to the chair. The committee conducted President-elect Smith to the chair.

President Srodes: Mr. Smith, I congratulate you on having received the highest gift and the highest honor that this association can give you. In transferring to you the cloak and the presidential chair I do so with the assurance that within its ample folds you will find enough of the generosity and charity of Meadville clinging thereto to carry our next convention to a successful conclusion. I introduce to the convention our next President, Mr. Smith. (Applause.)

Mr. Smith: Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen:—I feel it is almost idle for me to assure you of my appreciation of the gift you have bestowed upon me. I feel it a great honor, and if I could feel assured that I could fill this chair as fully and as ably as our retiring President, it would give me much gratification. I could not make a speech to you. I assure you I will bestow my very best efforts to try to fill this position as well as it is possible for me to do, and I feel that it is a much greater honor to our county than to myself. We are proud of Chester County, and any honor bestowed upon our county we fully appreciate. I trust that my efforts will receive your cordial support, and I assure you that when you come to Chester County next year we will put forth our best efforts to make your stay as pleasant as it has been here. We appreciate what the good people of Meadville, the Board of Commissioners and their associates have done to make this meeting a success. I feel that after you have imbibed the good fellowship of our county you will feel that it has done you good to have been there. I thank you. (Applause.)

Chas. Snyder (Philadelphia): Last year I was on the committee to name the place for the next meeting. We couldn't find any one that would have it and finally this place was suggested and we came here, and we have been taken good care of. I want to say that this convention has done well in agreeing to go to Chester County next year. They are people who will welcome you heartily

Mr. Smith is not a speaker, but he is a worker. I am glad he has been made our next President. He will take an interest in the matter and the people of Chester County will take an interest in it. (Applause.)

Mr. Levi Thomas (Chester County): As a member of the Board of Poor Directors of Chester County I want to thank you for your selection of Chester County as the next place of meeting. I feel that it is our duty as well as our pleasure to try to entertain this convention at its next session well. We have been so handsomely entertained in the western part of the state that we feel that perhaps we cannot entertain you as well as you have been here, but I beg to assure you that we will use our best efforts. We have many places of interest in our neighborhood: Our Valley Forge, our Battlefield of Brandywine, the Home of Bayard Taylor, and numerous other places of historic interest. We hope you will allow yourselves a little more time when you come to our county than we have had at some of the conventions. We thank you very much for the selection of our president. I am comparatively a new member of the board, but I know he has devoted many years of his life to the matters of public charity, and you will find him just what the association needs. (Applause.)

Col. Gould: I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without expressing the faithfulness with which old Chester has come up year after year, and I feel that we have given the honor this year where it has been earned. I feel also that I ought to say that some of us have a weakness for our friend, Mrs. Walton, and that weakness I think has strengthened our inclination to go there next year.

Mrs. Lydia Walton (Chester): I feel almost too modest to reply to Col. Gould at this time.

Mr. Ochse here moved that the convention now adjourn to meet at West Chester at a time to be set by the committee. Motion seconded by Chas. Snyder, of Philadelphia.

President Srodes: Before the fall of the official gavel today and before the convention at Meadville becomes a pleasant recollection only, I want to personally thank the local committee, the good ladies of Meadville and the members of this convention who have so heartily supported the chair in executing its functions, and I feel that I am unable to express how very much I appreciate the kindness that has been shown to me during the entire convention. I thank you all. (Applause.)

Rev. Buzza here pronounced the benediction, upon which the thirty-third annual convention stood adjourned.

LYCOMING COUNTY.

The Williamsport City Home.

In the fall of 1892 the Oversers of the Poor of the City of Williamsport purchased fifteen acres of splendid river bottom land, with ordinary farm buildings, situated across the river, one and one-half miles from this city.

On the 23rd of December, 1892, the inmates, about fifteen in number, were transferred from the former "Old Poor House" to the newly acquired home. The place was comfortable but cramped, and it was soon found that more room was needed for the ever increasing population. Plans and specifications were then secured for a new building. But for some unexplained reason the matter was dropped and for several years was lost sight of. Finally conditions reached such a state that the overseers again procured plans and specifications for a modern, up-to-date institution. Bids were invited and the contract let in July, 1906. Work was immediately begun and rushed to completion.

On April 3, 1907, the inmates, thirty-two (32) in number, were moved into the new home, which is one of the most complete, sanitary and convenient buildings that can be found anywhere. It consists of a building 210 feet long by 42 feet wide. Two stories and a basement, wherein is located the kitchen, laundry, store rooms, water tanks, boiler room, coal room, and vegetable cellar. First floor—dining room, clothes rooms, bath, toilet, corridor, day room and bed rooms for the infirm. Second floor is same as the first.

The sexes are separated, by the dining room on the first floor, and on the second floor by a door which is kept locked. The steward's quarters and chapel adjoining center of the new building. All are heated by steam and lighted by electricity and ventilated in the most approved fashion.

The Poor Directors of the City of Williamsport are to be congratulated on having completed an institution to which they can point with pride. They invite inspection at any time by any who may visit our city, which is known throughout the commonwealth as "The Ideal City for Homes and Business."

THE THIRTY-FOURTH ANNUAL CONVENTION

OF THE

ASSOCIATION OF

Directors of the Poor and Charities

OF THE

STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA

HELD IN THE

COURT HOUSE, AT WEST CHESTER, PENNA.

October 13, 14 and 15

The Thirty-Fourth Annual Convention of the Directors of the Poor and Charities of Pennsylvania convened at the Court House, at West Chester, Pa., on Tuesday, October 13th, 1908, at 10 a. m., and after some half hour spent in registering and forming acquaintances, during which time the delegates were entertained with music by the band from the Pennsylvania Training School at Elwyn, the Convention was called to order by President John L. Smith, of Chester Springs.

Devotional exercises were conducted by Rev. Washington R. Laird, Ph. D.

A happy incident occurred at the very beginning of the proceedings of the Convention, when Mr. L. C. Colborn, Corresponding Secretary and Treasurer of the Association, stepped forward and presented President Smith with a beautiful silver-mounted ebony gavel, and said:

Mr. President:—Authority is the first thing to learn in order to become a good citizen. Without authority people become criminals. From all ages down to this time the gavel has been the symbol of authority. In this instance the gavel usually represents the authority of those who govern.

This morning I noticed our President skinning his knuckles trying to call this assembly to order. Having some sympathy for him, in behalf of this Association I have the pleasure of presenting this gavel; the sound of which it should be the pleasure of all members and visitors here to obey. I hope, Mr. President, that you will accept it in behalf of the members of this Association; you will take it and govern this assembly with justice and equity, or cause or allow the same to be so done.

Applause.

President Smith: Mr. Colborn and Ladies and Gentlemen—I assure you I will make the best efforts I am capable of and if you are real obedient, I think we will get along.

The Elwyn Band here favored the convention with more music, which was much enjoyed and was received with applause.

President Smith:—Not having my glasses on when this beautiful gavel was presented to me I failed to notice that it was a souvenir gavel. I wish to thank Mr. Colborn and Colonel Gould and any others who were instrumental in presenting this to me.

I regret to state that our Congressman, Thomas S. Butler, was called to the State of Indiana and cannot be with us.

I am very glad to introduce to you the Burgess of West Chester, Hon. A. P. Reid, who will extend to you the freedom of the town and deliver the address of welcome.

ADDRESS OF WELCOME.

Hon. A. P. Reid was received with applause and said:

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen:

Called upon unexpectedly to fulfill this duty I will do it to the best of my ability. First, I am authorized to extend to you the freedom of the town, whatever that means. This is not a walled town. We have no gates by which to let you in and out, but you are free to go and come at your pleasure. There is nothing to prevent your going anywhere. Not that I want you to think it is a wide-open town. It is a decently-conducted town. A wide-open town isn't what you want. If you are here over Sunday the Sunday law might be enforced, which might hurt some people, but I don't think it would inconvenience any of you.

I offer you the freedom of the town. I have no keys to deliver over, unless someone is guilty of disorderly conduct, when I can send you to jail, but I don't think that will be necessary with this gathering. You are free to enjoy yourselves and get what you can of pleasure out of your stay here.

I welcome you to this place, which is old in history, going back more than a hundred years, and a place that has been noted for its charity and good works.

It is not a large town. We are a modest people, trying to do the best we can, but what we have we think is up-to-date and worthy of emulation. We have many things that will be instructive for you to see. You are welcome to visit all of them. We have a Normal School that is one of the best in the State, with more than 650 students, and with all the improvements and appliances necessary to the education of those who come within its influence. It is well worth a visit. I call special attention to the historical exhibits in the Library there.

We have a good system of public schools, with some thirteen or fourteen hundred children, and a High School, recently built, which is modern in every way and well worth a visit. The schools are all open to you. We have among them a separate colored school, with a colored Principal and teachers. It has proved a success. It shows that the colored people have good opportunities here.

We have some industrial institutions here: the principal one is the Separator Works, which are known the world over.

We have a manufactory of wheels, which is widely known.

We have two nurseries, both of which have acquired a world-wide name. You are also welcome to come to our homes, to see how we live. We are not extremely wealthy, but we live comfortably.

I welcome you also on account of what you are and what you stand for. The work you are engaged in, in uplifting the downfallen, the oppressed and the poor and afflicted, and the needy, appeals to the best elements of mankind and leads us to see and realize more of the Divine in man than any other work we can engage in.

Years ago we heard of the "Mistakes of Moses" and much ridicule was cast upon that old gentleman, but you go back to that great law-giver and you will find the seed and the roots of nearly all the philanthropic legislation of modern times. We have it in the laws of that great law-giver—the Laws of Moses. That is the law that is at the very foundation of your organization, and of the work you have to do, and it shows the reward that God has promised to those who do this work.

The poor will always be in the land, and it is our bounden duty to aid and to help them, without any reward from they themselves, but for that reward that cometh from above.

Therefore, for what you stand for and what you are engaged in, I heartily welcome you all.

Applause.

President Smith here introduced Mrs. Florence Cameron, who responded to the address of welcome, on part of the Children's Aid Society, as follows:

ADDRESS OF MRS. CAMERON.

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen:

In responding to the duty and privilege accorded me, and further extending a welcome hand to the many guests of this association, I am impressed with two things: First, the character and intelligence of the assemblage, and second, the tremendous work ahead—work that calls for the concentrated thought of trained minds, work that must be wrought out with all the skill born of experience and guided by the spirit of a broad and generous humanity.

Year by year grows more insistent the problem of the poor. Year by year we are learning that we cannot escape this responsibility.

What means our boasted dignity, if over the banquet music rises the cry of suffering children? How pitiful our pretentions, if through the woof of our social fabric runs the quivering threads of sorrow from the neglected poor! "Am I my brother's keeper?" Yes, a thousand times, yes, if he stumble in the bitter struggle—if he be born to the world one of the starved seed falilng on naked rocks, a mental and physical derelict. It is as much your duty and mine, and the State in which they find shelter to keep them, as it is to uphold the very hands of the government. We cannot escape this. Men and women are learning that peace, security, contentment—all that go to make life worth living—is not in the gospel of mine and thine. Rather is it found in accepting the responsibility God gave us, the stronger, and reaching out a helping hand, uplifting to a higher plane of personal growth, the needy.

Tnis is not sentiment. Show me a nation that neglects its poor, and I will show you a nation rapidly going to decay. It is part of the great law of humanity. We need the poor as much as they need us. Here in quiet Quaker Chester county we have no Midas mines of coal and oil. We bring no great gifts—no rich treasures to charity like many noble Pennsylvania cities and counties represented here. We have few millionaires. Most of us are plain, quiet folks who love our homes, and the green hillsides where lay our kinsmen of nearly three hundred years. But we try to take care of our dependent ones.

Much of this is through regular channels by an able Board of Directors, which, in turn, is liberally supported by the county. Much more is done through our various churches, hospital auxiliaries and charitable societies. Being an agricultural district, cases of actual destitution are rare and quickly relieved. In the years it has been my pleasure to labor with the noble women who constitute the Children's Aid Society of Chester County we have found comfortable homes for many little ones. Brightness, cheer and instruction have come to the pathway of those lives that otherwise might have been wrecked. Close to the gates of a great city, with all the destitution, desertion and cruelty that accompanies, we have helped a little in this wonderful work of the Children's Aid. At all times, under all circumstances, encouraged, supported, upheld by the most sympathetic and appreciative of officers and directors.

Believe me, I have neither desire nor intention to boast of its charity or any other virtue of my home county. Within a stone's throw are a score of eloquent lawyers, and prominent educators, with gracious greetings far superior to my best efforts. In extending our appreciation for the generous and cordial welcome extended us by the proud old town of West Chester—my County Seat—I have this word to say—next to the faithful administration of its laws, the first care of a State is its poor. Our moral and material success, city and country, rests heavily on the ability and intelligence of its charities and their officers.

It is a grave and very old problem. It began when the world began, and will continue to its end. Mere perfunctory routine of duties will not do, and I may be pardoned in saying frankly that any administrator of charity who is not in real touch or whose heart is not in unselfish sympathy with his work, fails in fruition of his mission, and would do a real favor to the cause in resigning.

The question is so broad, so full of intricacies, so difficult of satisfactory solution that nothing but patience and courage strengthened by sincere and earnest sympathy can ever fathom the depths.

On one hand we have a rich and prosperous State, willing to give and give largely—on the other, a clamoring, persistent cry for ever more. To be kind and just, to mediate, to temper the wind to the shorn lamb as well as keep the professional beggar wolf from the fold, this is our plain duty, trusting in His wisdom to show us the way. "For as much as ye have done it unto these my children, ye have done it unto me."

Through the exquisite charm and facinating beauty of these Autumnal days, with Nature dressed in her last toilet of the year, you come to us and with full hearts we welcome you. Give us of your enthusiasm, your wisdom, lend us from your storehouse of knowledge that we may go on with renewed vigor to uplift, ennoble, lead to God.

Again the Children's Aid welcomes you, and may God bless the children and the children's helpers everywhere.

Mrs. Cameron's address was received with applause, after which President Smith introduced Mr. Frederick Fuller, of Scranton, who addressed the Convention as follows, in response to the address of welcome:

ADDRESS OF MR. FULLER.

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen:

The kind words so gracefully and fitly spoken from the lips of the representatives of this center of refinement and culture has taken entire possession of our hearts. These words of cheer give us encouragement. They uplift us. They stimulate us, and I think we all fully appreciate them, and especially the words of His Honor, the Burgess of this town, who has proven himself to be not a broken "reed" nor smoking flax. He has given us the freedom of the town. In that he has assumed a great responsibility, but he has the power to enforce his orders and it is well for us to behave ourselves, so they will be glad when we leave here that they gave us the freedom of this beautiful place. I think these friends must have in their minds the great apostle's injunction, not to forget to entertain strangers, for thereby some have been entertaining angels unawares. I don't claim that we are a flock of angels, but there are some among us who can be very properly classed within that order, and there are other wings sprouting that we hope soon will become full fledged. (Laughter.)

We can hardly claim to belong to the tribe of Abou Ben Adem. A boy asked his father what a cannibal was and his father told him "one who loves his fellow men." Neither do we claim to be cannibals, even if some of the ladies do look good enough to eat.

The world's history is a record of tragedy and of man's inhumanity to man that has made countless thousands mourn. The thing we have in view is to reverse that order, so it may read that "man's humanity to man has made countless thousands rejoice." We are here as a body of men and women with entirely unselfish motives. We have come here to be identified with this greatest work that men and women can be engaged in, except the ministry of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

The object of this Association is to reform the old order of things. From time immemorial man has been savage and cruel and the hearts of the world have been bleeding.

We must love our work. If we do not the best thing to do is to step out and let some one who does love it take our places. Love is the greatest motive power in the world.

Love and charity are linked together, they say. To my mind there is a great distinction. There are many in our State who have been reduced to want and poverty from force of circumstances, but who in the days of their prosperity contributed largely to the relief of the suffering and destitute, who come to our doors and knock for admission and ask for aid.

That class of people have a legal and a moral right to all the aid we can give them. Now, it is love that actuates us to help such. It is a pleasure for us to do it.

There is another class who have lived lives of wickedness and sin and drunkenness and have brought themselves to dire want. They do not deserve aid, but they need it, and they are human and we have to care for them. That is where the virtue of charity comes in. Charity is defined to be kindness extended to the uncharitable. That is the distinction I make between love and charity. Charity covers a multitude of sins for the class I last named.

This great State is second to none in its magnanimous generosity in providing for the poor and needy. Many of us are officials, almoners and dispensers of public trusts, and as such we are held directly responsible to the authority that has placed us in these positions. It seems to me that the great State of Pennsylvania has some claim on the promise of the king that faithfully governs and protects the poor. The kingdom of such a king shall endure forever; and our great State, it seems to me is in line for receiving some of the fruits of that promise.

I think that we are constantly aware that to be a success in this great work we require all the virtues that are known. We require judgment, discrimination, kindness of heart, and a generosity that is controlled and governed by common sense.

I believe most of us fully understand that if we do not possess those qualifications we are unfit for the business. We meet cases almost daily that try our souls, but we have to make the best of it. We are trying to solve the wonderful problem of life. Our first parents got into a lot of trouble; the evil spirit gained full control over them, and it has been a vigorous struggle ever since. If it were not for this evil spirit we wouldn't have much of this work to do.

Perhaps you have heard the story of the little girl who was possessed of the spirit of going into a neighbor's berry patch; the parents discovered it and told her it was wrong and she mustn't, but she said she was tempted; and they said, "When you are tempted you must tell Satan to get behind you." She said, "All right," and the next day she dressed in a nice white dress, and she returned home with the white dress covered with berry stains and the parents knew where she had been, and they rebuked her and said to her, "Didn't we tell you to tell Satan to get behind you when you were tempted," and she said, "Oh, yes, I told Satan to get behind me, and he did, and he rushed me right into the berry bushes." (Laughter.)

I think, with all due respect to the gospel, that it is safer to get Satan right in front of us.

Within the last few years the silent reaper has thrust his sickle into our ranks and has harvested some of our most valuable grain. This will happen to us from year to year, but their places must be filled and the work must go on.

I have been a member of this Association about twelve years and I have seen the results of the zeal and the influence of this Association and I know it has been a great factor in this Commonwealth and has brought about great and needed reforms in the management of almshouses and asylums, and we want every community to know us; to know what we are and what we stand for. Every person in the State is deeply interested in our work. It is appealing, more and more every year, to the humane side of the people. We are now in our thirty-fourth year, and the founders of this Association have many of them gone to their reward.

We hope a greater and deeper interest will prevail in all our meetings, and as we go from this place we will go with the kindest impressions and gratitude for the friendly and cheering words we have heard here to-day. We all need sunshine in our hearts. This is a beautiful morning and all Nature is smiling upon us, and our hearts ought to be full of sunshine. I don't claim to be a ray of sunshine altogether, but I try to cultivate it. I like to see it in others.

I was walking down the street not long ago and I saw a lady friend coming, and it was a gloomy morning, and I says, "Hello, how are you, the nicest day this year?" She started and jumped almost out from her merry widow hat, and she says, "I haven't heard so cheerful a remark as that in a week; I was really thinking of the undertaker," and she was a married woman. (Laughter.)

She went on her way with a smile, and I think it did me more good than it did her.

Let us cultivate this sunshine in the heart. Go about with a pleasant face and a smile. There is nothing so valuable as a cheerful disposition. It is worth more than all the riches of the world.

I thank our friends for their kind words, and I thank you all.

Applause.

Mrs. H. F. Rankin (Fayette) responded to the address of welcome, on part of Children's Aid Society, as follows:

RESPONSE OF ADDRESS OF WELCOME ON PART OF CHILDREN'S AID SOCIETY.

By Mrs. H. L. Rankin, Uniontown, Pa.

Mr. President, Mayor, Ladies and Gentlemen of this Convention of 1908:

After listening to the cordial welcome tendered us by Mrs. Florence Cameron, of Chester County Children's Aid Society, and your Mayor, Hon. A. P. Reid, all giving us the freedom of this beautiful old town of West Chester, I certainly think it an honor to represent the Children's Aid Society and be permitted to respond for them.

We are thankful for your kind greetings and warm assurances of welcome. I have attended these conventions, without omission since October, 1896, when it was held in Pittsburg, therefore, this will be my thirteenth. I feel confident in saying we will not abuse this liberty given us, so that our good friends will not be made twice glad—with our coming and our going.

I can speak from twelve year's experience that each year I find the conventions more interesting and of more benefit than the year before. I well remember at Scranton, in 1897, Mrs. Lay, of Oil City, and myself were the only ones, I think, from Western Pennsylvania's Children's Aid Society and to my surprise, while talking to our attorney, H. F. Detwiler, heard my name called by the President of the convention, asking me to respond for the Children's Aid Society welcome, as Mrs. Wilson was not present nor had sent any paper. I was startled at the request as I was not only a stranger but new to the convention, and was going to decline, but Mr. Detwiler insisted and said, "Get up and say anything you think of, it is better than a refusal." That was my first speaking in public. I was nervous and said but little, but the convention greeted me so kindly that I made up my mind I would do the best I could to help such a body of good men and women who were trying to give us valuable assistance in our work, especially when I noticed how many refused. I have seen the interest in Children's Aid Society work grow rapidly in these twelve years; as where only two or three spoke of our work, there are now about one-third of the papers and talks in the interest of Children's Aid Societies. This Convention, I am assured, will be better than the preceding ones, therefore we should be more encouraged in the good work.

Again, I wish to return the heartfelt thanks of the Children's Aid Society for the cordial welcome we have received and the pleasant and agreeable arrangements made for our entertainment, but the proof of our sincerity will be in our efforts to make this Convention not one of fine addresses and flowery speeches only, but in Christian endeavor to learn from each other the best ways of doing the best work, as we find the work increasing greatly every year, and are in more need of active workers than any other charity, so hope the good members of this convention will say and do all they can to assist the Children's Aid Societies of this grand old State of Pennsylvania.

The Elwyn Band here favored the Convention with more music, giving a medley, which was much enjoyed, and closing by rising and giving in a superb manner, "The Star Spangled Banner." All the delegates also rising.

Dr. J. Lewis Srodes:—I think one of the most embarrassing moments of my life was at a meeting of this Association when I had to rise and announce the fact, myself, that I was about to make an address. I have volunteered to make this announcement for our worthy President, after a conference with him and recognizing the fact that he must feel as I felt at that time. I now announce the President's annual address.

President Smith was received with applause and addressed the Convention as follows:

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

Ladies and Gentlemen, Members of this the 34th Annual Convention of the Association of the Directors of the Poor and Charities of Pennsylvania:

To me has fallen the pleasure and the privilege of bidding you welcome to this old historic County of Chester. In behalf of the good people of the Borough of West Chester, let me bid you a most hearty welcome to the hospitality and the homes of this town. West Chester has long been noted for its institutions of learning, the intelligence of its people and the hospitality of its homes, and I sincerely hope and believe that when this convention shall have closed, you will all go to your homes feeling that it was good to be here, and bearing with you only pleasant recollections.

I see your program calls for an "address" from your President. I assure you it is not my intention to inflict any such thing upon you. In the first place I could not deliver an address worthy of the occasion should I try, and in the second place, there has been so much said, and so well said, that I feel it would be much better for me to confine myself to bringing just a few matters before you, for your patient consideration.

When you have become better acquainted with this modest Quaker town of West Chester, the County Seat of this great county, and have sampled its hospitality, you will not wonder that Chester county was the first county in the State outside of Philadelphia to organize for the care and protection of the poor and unfortunate within its borders. This organization was effected in 1798. That year a farm of 325 acres was purchased. In 1799 a brick building, 40x100 feet, was erected on it as a home for the destitute poor. This building was succeeded by the present one, erected in 1855. This shows that the people of this good old County of Chester have had charitable hearts and that sympathies have always gone out to the poor and unfortunate of this vicinity.

But, alas, how much yet remains to be done! I fear we are too prone to forget those who have not had the advantages that we have had. Oh, how many are sick at heart and broken in spirit for the want of a kind and sympathetic word of encouragement! Let us not forget our duty to these. To be able to make better and more useful men and women out of those less fortunate than ourselves is, indeed, a privilege, and an object worthy of our best effort. For, when our hands reach out to lift up our fallen and unfortunate fellow-man, then are we following in the footsteps of our Lord and Master. I congratulate you, fellow directors, on being members of an organization that has this for its aim and object.

Let us each endeavor to realize fully our responsibility to this Association and to our fellow-men.

We need each others' co-operation and assistance, as members of our Association in order that we may live up to our opportunities, and fully meet our obligations, may I, therefore, ask your kind assistance during the sessions of this meeting. There are those among us who have had much valuable experience along this line of work, and what they can and, I trust will, tell us will prove very helpful indeed to those newer in the work.

Allow me to commend to you most warmly the work of our Ladies' Aid. Fellow Directors, do you have a Children's Aid Society in your county? If not, why not? Let me appeal to you strongly not to fail to interest your good women in this great work of caring for the children. How important to guide the footsteps of the little ones aright! No greater or grander work can be found.

I cannot refrain from referring to the splendid work done by the Ladies' Aid of this county. I could point you to many good and useful men and women who have come up from the ranks of unfortunate children, who needed the fostering care of this Society and received it; and there are still others who, through the kindly, sympathetic influence and help of these ladies, have become better men and better women than would have been possible without their aid. We would heartily commend this noble work.

Another important question I beg leave to bring before your thoughtful attention is this: Should we not devote more time to investigating the cause which produces and increases our criminal and dependent classes? In my judgment this is a very important matter, and I am convinced that a thorough, honest, intelligent study of it would result in greatly reducing these classes. I am profoundly convinced that there is one principal cause that stands out above and beyond every other in the production of crime, poverty, misery and distress. So little has been done, as yet, by our Association in the way of studying causes, as we have been exerting nearly all our efforts in taking care of effects. May God help us to approach the study of this great question in the right spirit; and help us to open our eyes to the true facts, arouse our consciences to a full realization of our duty to our fellow-man, give us power to see it, and that willingness to work that our Saviour possessed.

In conclusion I would recommend the appointment of a committee to study the cause of the increase in our dependent and criminal classes, to report at our next year's meeting of this Association.

At the conclusion of President Smith's address, which was received with applause, Mrs. M. E. H. Sowers, of Ridgway, President of C. A. S. of Western Pennsylvania, was introduced to the Convention by President Smith, and read the following interesting paper, which was received with applause:

VALUE OF CHILD RESCUE.

Open the door for the children,
Tenderly gather them in,
In from the highways and hedges,
In from the places of sin.

Look at the smiles for a thank you,
Just now be looking to see,
If any are out while 'tis stormy,
Give to them shelter all free.

Some are so weak and so helpless,
Some are so hungry and so cold,
Fatherless, motherless and loveless,
But Christ calls them all to His fold.

In this splendid golden age, this wonderful Twentieth Century, so blessed with the cumulative wisdom and experience of the past, with the awakened thought and quickened intellect of the present, it is marvelous that the grand work and object of the Children's Aid Society, and other child-saving agencies, have not, to a greater extent, attracted the attention and enlisted the sympathy of every Christian, humanitarian and patriot in the land.

The value of a child cannot be estimated by ordinary standards. Its personality is of infinite worth and its protection a supreme duty. Its education is of paramount interest to Society, to the State and to the Church. Therefore, every agency for the right education of that child should be encouraged, "and the transfer of human waifs from pathways that descend and degrade," into those that elevate and lead to the higher walks of life, should commend itself to every one, as a work which meets a genuine want, and as the most effectual remedy for a growing and insidious evil.

Over a quarter of a century ago, Alexander Dumas asserted that half of the existing vagabonds was produced by forsaken, neglected childhood. Reference to criminal records, and experience of keen observers, prove this assertion; also that it is not only the history of the past, but of to-day.

Unquestionably, no argument is required to prove that the dependent and vicious element, in nearly all communities is largely the result of neglected childhood; and this element is recruited not so much by the law of heredity in itself, as by a constantly increasing acquisition of children, thrown helpless upon the world, by the death or desertion of one or both of their natural protectors.

Our system of public charity and permanent institutional care, kindly intended to alleviate and improve the condition of these unfortunates, is inadequate and, while providing shelter and temporary succor, has ultimately, frequently proven a detriment instead of the anticipated benefit, by fastening upon its proteges habits of dependence and indolence thus preventing, or at least retarding, the growth of self-help and self-respect.

Therefore, homeless, forsaken children are best aided by absolute removal from the blight and shadow of former surroundings, into the sunshine of comfortable family homes, where Christian training shall prepare them for the duties of life and respected citizenship.

The imperative claim this class of children, deprived of salutary government and the disciplinary restraint, asserts, should render us not only willing, but alert to champion their cause remembering that youth requires forming not reforming. Every child saved from the slums or streets means one criminal or pauper less to be dealt with in the coming years—the silent, thronging future.

Thus is it clearly demonstrated that if this work receives support, commensurate with its importance, that other branches of benevolent endeavor will be, if not totally abolished, rendered less necessary.

Who that desires to be useful can be so well employed, or what can so stimulate and develop the noblest impulses within us as to engage in shielding the child from the perils and hazards of orphanage?

In what other direction can so large a percentage of good be realized from the means invested?

It is a work that touches the tenderest chords of our nature, and is stamped with the highest approval of the Deity.

But with all these incentives how few are the laborers in so plenteous a harvest. Hundreds, yes thousands, of children in this fair country, for each one of whom, a home involving all of comfort and happiness that life affords, is waiting, are drifting away towards a dark precarious future. The faithful, loyal men and women of the various Children's Societies are working nobly as results show, but they can't do it all.

The children already provided for, the homes that have been brightened by their presence, are object lessons which the entire Christian and charitable world should study. The nation, more and more, recognizes that its important population is its children. Schools and prohibitory laws are not for its men and women, but to expand the powers of and to guard its children; not for to-day alone, but for the great to-morrow, as,

"Life's field will yield as they make it,
A harvest of thorns or of flowers."

The work for children in the church and Sunday School, in the public school or in the Children's Aid Society is the most fundamental, scientific, hopeful and important work we can accomplish.

Think of the possibilities in each little child's life; to the child itself, possibilities of joy or pain, of expanding noble character, or deep degradation in sin; possibilities to the world of helpfulness and leadership in intelligence and moral power or of demoralizing deadly influences.

Every child's unfolding, maturing life is to make this world better or worse. We cannot see these possibilities; they slumber in the child's soul as the oak slumbers in the acorn, but how great that oak may become we cannot forsee.

Each child is both a glorious and a fearful possibility. Because of the advancement and leavening influence of Christian civilization these possibilities are no longer limited by accident of birth or environment.

In the long ago men were born kings, or noblemen, or slaves or beggars and as they were born so they remained. But that condition has nearly passed away, and to-day, in our free land, every child is given opportunities for his possibilities.

We cannot state or even satisfactorily predict, who will be the Mayor of this beautiful little city, nestling among the hills, forty years from now, whether the boy born in one of its rich families, clad in velvet coat, or the friendless lad, clad in homespun, for whom the Children's Aid Society recently found a home in your midst.

Who shall, fifty years hence, be President of the United States? The grandson of the present noble ruler, or the motherless boy who is now a ward of one of our charitable organizations?

It is just as likely to be the latter as the former.

Abraham Lincoln, James Garfield, Henry Wilson, Salmon P. Chase, Thomas Edison and many other men of bright intellect, who rose to prominence, were children of poverty.

What degree of mental force, executive energy, aspiration, special genius and broad manhood or womanhood, is wrapped up in one of these helpless babies! God alone knows, and it is a ponderous question in which direction these dormant energies will trend. Shall these children be left to become leaders among the corrupt classes, or shall they be saved to become leaders on the better side? They will surely, to a certain extent, be leaders of some kind; we cannot prevent that. Are we not, in a way, responsible for the outcome? I think so.

Our free ballot and free schools make the poorest boy an heir-apparent to the throne and the fact of his poverty makes him discontented with his position, and arouses to endeavor all the latent forces of his very soul. The rich man's son is, usually, contented with the position in which he is born; the average man's son is, generally, satisfied with his rank, but the child of poverty, who inherits nothing but capacity, is excited by his discontent to exert all his powers; hence, in a democracy, the majority of the leaders in commerce and politics, come from the poorer homes, and it is a noticeable fact that children left fatherless, frequently make the most successful men and women, that is, develop the greatest ability.

Capacity is what God gives the child; ability is what the lad works out of his capacity; but the character of that ability depends entirely upon the education and surroundings given him.

The Honorable Judge Lindsay, of Juvenile Court fame, decides, after careful study and close observation of crime, that the dangerous classes arise from the extremes of Society, the children of the multi-millionaire and the children of the extremely poor; the former who, for lack of nothing in this world's goods, are being encouraged to live lives of luxuriant idleness; and the latter whose restless ambition is without moral restraint.

The prime work of the Children's Aid Society, is not merely one of pity for the distressed destitute child, but of philanthropy for the future of the community, and to save these children from shocking possibilities securing for them noble certainties.

And oh, what satisfaction and gratification is enjoyed in witnessing the delightful results, particularly in watching each child in whose individual case we were personally interested and with whose rescue we were connected.

It also affords great happiness to realize that the majority, thus saved, appreciate the word "home," and the love of foster parents, who so tenderly shield them from the trials and tribulations of a not always sympathetic world.

I cannot refrain from relating the true tale and happy sequel of a little British waif, who is now a woman-grown, highly esteemed and admired.

Many, many years ago, there dwelt in England a far-famed authoress, and her husband who was an invalid and a cripple.

The couple lived an ideal happy life, residing near London, then only a large town. One day, the literary woman heard, quite incidentally, that a wee baby had been found on a large stone at the cross-roads, that it had been taken to the town hall, and that all the gentry were hastening to see it on account of its remarkable beauty. So, following the example of her neighbors, she too went. Looking up into the sweet, sympathetic face of the famed authoress the tiny baby smiled and reached out her pretty hands. The woman could not resist this and resolved to adopt the infant, a resolution she immediately executed. As time passed on and she became more and more devoted to the child, she was determined that if it lay in her power its heart should never be wounded by unkind allusions to the story of its discovery and adoption.

Consequently, as soon as the little girl could comprehend, it was lovingly whispered to her, that she had been found on the stone which now adorned the hall of her mother's house and which always was decorated with flowers; also that God had placed her there in order that her mother might easily find her. When she grew older it became her pleasant daily duty to cull and arrange these flowers to render beautiful this rock which had been dug up from the cross-roads and brought home.

To her, it represented the place where the angels had rested, when they laid her down. Curiously enough, the child positively became proud of the manner in which she had reached the dear mother, who now cared for her as tenderly and lovingly as though she were her own flesh and blood.

The years have gone by, the eyes of that dear, blessed mother are closed forever upon all earthly scenes, but the child she so carefully reared, still lives, in the great city of London, a talented, prominent woman, and she remembers.

Who was the authoress, the foster-mother, you ask?

Dinah Mulock Craik, the celebrated writer of John Halifax, Gentleman.

Let us toil on and on, dear friends, and employ every means and exert every effort to advance this beneficent cause, and apply ourselves more assiduously to the solution of the ponderous problem of child-saving, not altogether disbelieving in heredity, but believing more in the efficiency of thorough, intellectual, moral and Christian training; more in the necessity of a pure home-life; more in the doctrine of fair-play and a fair chance in life, for the child as well as the adult, and still more in the influence of the Christ-child on the childhood of our race.

Hope, sooner or later, in any just cause, is followed by fruition and the work of child rescue, this most potent of reforms, will without a question, sooner or later, become established in the hearts of all the world's good people, who remember the divine words of our Blessed Master:

"Who so shall receive one such little child in my name receiveth me."

In closing, may I repeat, a beautiful legend, which has often been referred to in connection with this work, it is this:

One evening while a terrific storm prevailed, St. Christopher found a tiny child wandering upon the banks of a great river which he was about of necessity to ford. "Please take me with you," pleaded the sweet voice of the little one. The giant saint stooped and clasping the childish form in its arms entered the wild waters pressing on and on amidst the tempest, across the stream, though almost swept away by the raging current. But when he at last safely reached the further bank and deposited his burden upon the shore, lo, it was no longer the child he had carried, but the radiant form of our Blessed Lord who had in this way tested his love and devotion.

Thus shall it be for those who for Christ's sake have aided in this work of saving the perishing. They shall find that in sheltering his homeless little ones they have indeed done it unto Himself.

Let us labor on until the Evening Star, let us give our very best to forsaken childhood to raise it from lowlands to the highlands and prepare it for the struggles and tragedies it must later meet along the highway. Let us pluck away the thistle which surround these unfortunate little lives, and plant roses, for roses will surely grow. And may we always remember that the little heart that is soonest awake to the flowers is always the first to be touched by the thorns.

An aged man or woman reaching life's golden sunset with no home or shelter is indeed a pitiful sight.

A homeless young man or woman with neither kin nor friends is to be greatly pitied, but sadder still, yes quite the saddest sight on earth is the homeless, parentless, "nobody's child," dependent upon the charity of an unsympathetic world.

Alone in the dreary, pitiless street,
With my torn old dress and bare cold feet,
All day I have wandered to and fro,
Hungry and shivering and nowhere to go.

The night's coming on in darkness and dread,
And the chill sleet's beating upon my bare head,
Oh, why does the wind blow upon me so wild?
Is it because I am nobody's child?

Just over the way there is a flood of light,
And warmth and beauty, and all things bright,
Beautiful children in robes so fair,
And caroling songs in rapture there,

I wonder if they in their blissful glee,
Would pity a poor little girl like me,
Wandering alone in the merciless street,
Naked and shivering and nothing to eat.

Oh, what shall I do when the night comes down,
In its terrible blackness all over the town?
Shall I lay me down neath the angry sky,
On the cold hard pavements alone to die?
When the beautiful children their prayers have said,
And mammas have tucked them up snugly in bed,
No dear mother upon me smiles,
Why is it, I wonder, that I am nobody's child?

At the conclusion of Mrs. Sowers' paper, Mr. H. W. Ochse read the following memorial:

MEMORIAL.

Rarely does such a duty as I am called upon to perform to-day fall to the lot of any member of any association, that of recording the death of four of its members, all of whom I claimed as among my most intimate friends, and who have served with me continually for many years.

Mr. W. H. Guy and Mary Jane Duncan Guy, his wife, Colonel W. J. Glenn and Martha E. Glenn, his wife, all were members of this Association for many years and were all earnest and active in its welfare.

Mr. Guy was born September 11, 1823, and spent almost his entire life within the confines of the county of his birth. On October 29, 1844, he married Miss Mary Jane Duncan, who shared his joys and sorrows until his death, January 21st of this year, and who followed him across the narrow stream that divides the island of time from the mainland of eternity within a few hours of the time when his sorrowing friends had said their last farewell.

Mrs. W. J. Glenn died October 19, 1907,, within a few days after our last meeting.

Col. W. J. Glenn was born August 1, 1839, at Carnegie, Pa., and spent his boyhood in what was then called the Borough of Mansfield. He answered his country's call and served throughout the Civil War. Was twice wounded and endured the privations of war during the darkest period of the nation's history. Colonel Glenn was Superintendent of the Allegheny County Home for almost fourteen years and up to the time of his death maintained an active interest in its affairs.

Mr. Guy was elected Director of the Poor during the year 1884 and served continuously as President of the Board since that time to the time of his death. He has been at every meeting of this Association but one for almost a quarter of a century.

This remarkable quartette of friends were identified with the administration of the Charities of Allegheny county for many years and their winsome personalities will be recalled by the pioneer members of this association, and it is a fitting tribute to their memory that their deaths be recorded at this meeting, in this community where Friends and their Society have left the imprint of their character on every field and feature of this portion of our Commonwealth. These were true friends, friends who would pour the truth into your hearts though you might wince under it. Friends who would defend you when you were unjustly assailed by the tongues of calumny. Friends who would not forsake you when you had fallen into disgrace, who would counsel you in your doubts and perplexities, who would open their purses to aid you without expecting any returns for their favors, who would rejoice in your prosperity and grieve at your adversity, who would bear half of your burden, who would add to your joys and diminish your sorrows by sharing in both.

Dr. Shrodes offered the following resolution, on the death of Thomas Hughes:

Whereas, the Grim Reaper has invaded our ranks and removed from our midst the Vice-President of this Association, Mr. Thomas J. Hughes, one who was actively identified with this Association for a number of years; therefore, be it Resolved, That in the death of Mr. Hughes this convention has lost an active and a faithful member, one who was conscientious in the performance of every duty, one whose unerring judgment and wise counsel will be sorely missed in our deliberations; one whose unselfish disposition, tender sympathies and firm rulings particularly fitted him for the position of trust that he filled for so many years, one whose constant aim was the amelioration of the condition of those who had unfortunately become a public charge, one who always regarded public office as a sacred trust, and one whose manly life will ever inspire those who knew him.

Resolved, That these resolutions be spread upon the minutes and a copy sent to the family of the deceased.

Upon motion of Col. E. P. Gould (Erie), the resolution introduced by Dr. Shrodes was unanimously adopted by the Convention.

Upon motion, the convention moved and carried that the Committees be named and announced at the afternoon session.

Upon motion the Convention here adjourned until two o'clock.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention was called to order by President Smith at 2 p. m.

The Elwyn Band favored the Convention with music, giving the overture to a Poet and Peasant, in a very creditable manner.

President Smith extended to the delegates invitations to visit the Normal School also the Cream Separator Works, the Trust Company, and other places in the town; also a general invitation to citizens to attend all sessions of the Convention.

The following committees were here announced by the President:

AUDITING COMMITTEE—H. W. Osche, Allegheny; Philip Hartzog, Cambria; Levi Roland, Erie.

COMMITTEE ON OFFICERS—Dr. J. Lewis Srodes, Allegheny; Fred Fuller, Lackawanna; J. S. Strine, Lancaster; Charles Stille, Germantown; Mrs. J. H. McLean, Pittsburg; H. H. Baumgardner, Venango; Mrs. Florence Cameron, Chester.

PLACE OF MEETING—John H. McDaniel, Montgomery; Jacob Kessler, Bucks; John McCabe, Carbondale; D. A. Mackin, Luzerne; Simon Shoemaker, Blair; Mrs. E. H. Sowers, Elk; Sue Willard, Indiana.

RESOLUTIONS—W. O. Nicklas, Franklin; F. H. Yost, Somerset; Dr. W. A. Payne, Lackawanna; C. A. Snyder, Philadelphia; Dr. Martin M. Barr, Delaware; Mrs. Adelaide Comfort, Chester; Thomas Cassady, Luzerne; Mrs. E. S. Lindsey, Warren; J. J. Barnhart, Fayette; Dr. Emmens, Huntingdon; Mrs. L. B. Walton, Chester; Oliver P. Bohler, Philadelphia.

Col. E. P. Gould here read a letter extending to the members an invitation to attend the Ninth Annual Meeting of the Society of Charities and Corrections of the State of New York, at Elmira, N. Y., on November 17th, 18th and 19th.

D. A. Mackin, of Luzerne, introduced the following resolution:

RESOLUTIONS.

By D. A. Mackin.

Whereas, The Association of Directors of the Poor and Charities of the State of Pennsylvania is organized for the purpose of interchanging ideas and taking action on the bettering of worthy subjects of charities in general; and,

Whereas, It has come to the notice of members of this Association, especially those whose field embrace mercantile and industrial centers, that much of the pauperism of women and children under their charge is caused by the constantly increasing evil of husbands deserting their families; and,

Whereas, Many such runaway husbands and deserting fathers enjoy immunity from punishment while their wives and offspring become public charges; and,

Whereas, This sense of security from punishment undoubtedly tends to multiply such cases, and some assurance of punishment would act as a deterrent; and,

Whereas, It would seem that Districts and Societies affiliated with this Association could adopt some means for the dissemination of information relative to deserters and aid in tracing such deserters in their respective districts and to call in, if expedient, the aid of police authorities to apprehend such malefactors so that they may be returned to their place of settlement and properly punished; and,

Whereas, By such concerted action, at least an attempt would be made by this Association to stay the growth of this great evil; therefore be it

Resolved That the President of this Association be empowered to appoint and by virtue of that power that he appoint a committee to consist of five members from among the delegates to this convention to consider, and, if possible, to formulate some method whereby this Association may be enabled to take some effective action on this serious subject; and be it further

Resolved, That said committee be instructed to make every effort to report before the close of this convention.

Mr. Mackin:—In Luzerne county that is one of the great troubles we have—desertion. We are constantly obliged to take care of families.

Mr. L. C. Colborn:—I am heartily in favor of that resolution. We are experiencing a good deal of trouble in that direction. I second the resolution and ask that a committee be appointed as asked for.

The resolution is adopted.

Mrs. J. H. McLean presented and read the following report of Children's Aid Society of Western Pennsylvania.

REPORT OF CHILDREN'S AID SOCIETY OF WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen:

The Children's Aid Society of Western Pennsylvania is unique as a charitable organization.

It is without a home save the one modest office in the Free Dispensary Building in Pittsburg. It is a chartered Society and has auxiliary societies working under its charter in twenty-three counties of Western Pennsylvania. Each one of these daughters, housed in the same simple way as the parent society.

Are you curious to know what we do and how it is done?

Our object, as you may know from our name, is to provide for the welfare of destitute and neglected children by such means as shall be best for them and the community. We talk of the "Delineator Child Rescue Campaign." When we first heard of that we said, why that has been our object and work for the past twenty years. It is not new to Western Pennsylvania.

We have cared for 5250 of these neglected ones in that time. Finding them homes by adoption, under guardianship; placing them in institutions and caring for them temporarily, afterwards returning them to parents and friends. They have been of all ages from the infant of days to the young woman who leaves us on coming of age.

In our care at last report we had 845 children. We received from the almshouse since last report 130. Some of our counties work with the County Commissioners and in this way the children are taken from the almshouses. From all other sources we have had 410. The total number of children in care of the Society for the year being 1385.

We care for the children in various ways. Some are placed in boarding houses. By that we mean carefully selected private families, usually of limited means, where we pay a moderate rate of board.

When possible, this board is paid by the friends or parents, legitimate or otherwise, to prevent needless separation of mothers and children.

Of this class we have had 463 in the past year.

When children are given to the Society unreservedly, as is so often done, we find them free homes, and by that is meant homes where they are cared for at no expense to the Society, with the understanding that they will be cared for physically, mentally and morally. If of school age they will be sent to school. If over school age they will be taught to work and to earn their own living.

Of this class we had 285 in the past year.

Many of the children come to us needing medical and often surgical treatment, and some are deficient mentally. Of these we had placed in hospitals and institutions 138. Here let me speak a word for the hospitals and institutions, of their unalloyed kindness to our Society at all times. Among the hospitals, I may mention the Eye and Ear, of Pittsburg, and the Allegheny General, of Allegheny.. Nothing has been too hard or too tedious for them to undertake for us, and all for the good of the cause.

The doctors of our cities have shown us much kindness, almost without exception giving their services for nothing.

Of the children returned to friends there were 234; of children adopted, 39. The children adopted are almost always the very young. It is very seldom we can have a child adopted after 10 years of age.

Therefore, we insist upon adoption promptly after the usual time given in which to decide if the child will suit the place, which is one year.

The number of children who died during the year was 51. These were almost all infants that died during the very hot weather.

During the year 14 of our young people were married and 17 of them reached their majority and passed from our care.

Of mothers assisted there were 191. This assistance is given in numerous ways. Mothers come to us asking our help in caring for their children while they find work. During the past year we have had many cases of this kind; and not only mothers, but fathers, too.

Men out of work and having sick wives we have helped by caring for the children while the mother was sent to the hospital and the father made an effort to find work for himself.

Through the kindness of friends and the Needle Work Guild we were enabled to give hundreds of garments of all kinds to those in need of such things. Work was found for many women and not a few men.

All this is out of our line of work, but we felt we could do this for the children of larger growth during the financial stress.

Visits were made to 1129 children, and in the interest of the work 4068.

It has always been the custom of the Society to keep within its income in doing its legitimate work.

Through the Safe Deposit and Trust Company of Pittsburg, our financial agents, we have received from the State of Pennsylvania for the year, $6250, an increase of $1250 over last year. From all other sources we received approximately, $14,000, making a total of $20,250 for the year's work.

The largest amount given being in Fayette county, where their work is mostly with the Poor Directors, and all the poor children of the county pass through the hands of the Society. Next comes Allegheny county whose work is of a mixed nature and her moneys are received from many sources. Benefit fees, membership dues, donations from friends and money paid by parents and friends for the temporary care of children.

The different counties receive their proportion of the State appropriation and while some can keep within this proportion, many of the county societies find it necessary to solicit help from the friends of the cause.

But a very small part of this money is paid out in salaries. The bulk of it being used directly in the work.

Here we conclude our report with the suggestion of the poet:

You, who behold and fain would satisfy
The unsufficed—
Remember still beneath the sunset sky
Walketh the Christ.
Not yours to bless and break the living bread,
In surplice clad,
But yours to find among the throng unfed
That little lad.

The following report of the Children's Aid Society of Delaware County, that was to have been given by Margaret G. Sellers, was read by Mrs. Patience Kent:

REPORT OF CHILDREN'S AID SOCIETY OF DELAWARE COUNTY.

To the Association of the Directors of the Poor and Charities of the State of Pennsylvania:

The Delaware County Children's Aid Society takes pleasure in being represented in your body for the first time, and its members, who have so recently entered their field of service have come among you with a realization of their need of more knowledge and wisdom and hoping to share the fruits of your larger and wider experience.

Our Society was organized March 7, 1906, and was the outgrowth of a smaller and more local association of women who for several years had labored in the interest of neglected children, and who realized the importance of organizing the entire county in a more official body for the satisfactory continuance of their work.

Delaware county has proved a difficult one in which to secure homes for children, either free or boarding, owing to its largely suburban nature and consequent high cost of living, and to this prevailing character and pursuits of its population. Though confronted by this condition we have striven to extend aid to every case possible, and, while our success has not measured up to our desires, we feel that our efforts are more than rewarded by the assistance we have been able to give in many cases.

Our Society has a membership of about 150, and consists of seven local branches, most of which hold local meetings in addition to the regular county meetings which are held quarterly.

At present there are but thirteen wards under our care, seven of whom were paupers; but assistance of a varied character has been extended by most of our local branches to needy families or individuals in their vicinity, though care has been exercised to avoid pauperizing them.

It is our desire to pursue our work in cordial co-operation with our County Directors, and after careful consideration of the subject, we have established a mutual agreement for the execution of our common work.

It gives us pleasure to express here our appreciation of the sympathetic encouragement given us ever since our organization by our older sister society of Chester county, which has ever been ready with valuable advice and offers of assistance.

While realizing that we are as yet only beginners in this much needed work, we trust that as our system improves and experience increases, we shall be able to meet more efficiently the varied demands for the relief of the unfortunate children of Delaware county.

President Smith:—We have with us this afternoon one who appears for the first time among us. You will be pleased to hear him. I introduce to the convention Mr. Bromley Wharton, Secretary and General Agent of the Board of Public Charities, who will address us on the subject, "Functions of the Board of Public Charities."

Mr. Wharton was received with applause and addressed the Convention as follows:

FUNCTIONS OF THE BOARD OF PUBLIC CHARITIES.

The Board of Public Charities was established under the provisions of an Act approved April 24, 1869, and I cannot present to you its duties in any clearer or more concise manner than by quoting a few lines from that act.

"Section 5.—The said Commissioners shall have full power, either by themselves or the General Agent, at all times to look into and examine the condition of all charitable, reformatory or correctional institutions within the State, financially and otherwise; to inquire and examine into their methods of instruction, the government and management of their inmates, the official conduct of trustees, directors and other officers and employes of the same, the condition of the buildings, grounds and other property connected therewith, and into all other matters pertaining to their usefulness and good management; and for these purposes they shall have free access to the grounds, buildings, and all books and papers relating to such institutions."

In addition to this, the General Agent and his assistants visit and examine into the condition of all the County Jails or Prisons, and the Alms or Poor Houses of the State, as well as the Hospitals and Homes, with a view not only to correcting abuses, but to illustrating in reports to the Board "the causes and best treatment of pauperism, crime, disease and insanity."

It is also the duty of the Board to receive the applications of charitable institutions for State aid, "to inquire carefully into the grounds of such requests, the purpose or purposes for which the aid is asked, the amounts which will be required, and into any matters connected therewith, and to report to the Legislature the result of such inquiries, together with "the opinions and conclusions of the Board thereon."

Just here I would call your attention to the somewhat startling fact that the entire amount appropriated by the State of Pennsylvania for its institutions for the year 1870 was but $395,355, whereas, for the years 1907 and 1908 the Legislature appropriated $14,234,849 for State and private charitable institutions. With these figures before you, you cannot but recognize the fact that the work of the State Board of Charities has correspondingly increased. The Legislature of 1907, realizing that the work of the Board has grown, wisely granted additional help in the examination and inspection of the institutions of the State. Whenever abuses or wrongs are discovered by the agents of the Board, the facts are promptly reported to the General Agent and Secretary, and he in turn, acting with or for the Executive Committee, personally looks into all complaints. If the circumstances seem to justify an investigation, it is made by the Board, and the abuses and wrongs are in most cases corrected.

A very important function of the Board of Public Charities in this State is the oversight of nearly sixteen thousand insane, most of whom are indigent, who are distributed among the public and private institutions of Pennsylvania. The Act of 1883 created a special Committee on Lunacy, consisting of five members of the Board, three of whom are required to be especially appointed by the Governor and confirmed by the Senate. One of these must have been a member of the Bar of at least ten years' standing, and one a practicing physician of at least ten years' standing. The Committee annually elects a Chairman and Secretary, the present Chairman being the Hon. Isaac Johnson, of Delaware county, and the Secretary, Dr. Frank Woodbury, of Philadelphia, both of whom will take part in the exercises of this session, and will speak on the care of the insane. The Committee visits every institution in the State in order to make personal investigation of the treatment of the insane. All these institutions, in which the insane are kept, must twice a year give statistical reports of their administration, and the Committee on Lunacy reports annually to the Board of Public Charities upon the subjects committed to their charge.

There is one provision of the law creating this Board with which you are all doubtless familiar, and that is that the Poor Directors shall furnish returns within ten days after the expiration of the period which they cover. It is incumbent upon the Board to collect such data for its report to the Legislature, and this is a vast work, in which the cooperation of all the officials interested is required.

We must urge the Poor Directors to see that their returns to this Board be furnished promptly, and also that prompt attention be given to our correspondence. We find it extremely difficult to obtain all the data in proper shape for incorporation in our annual report. We have found it impossible, in fact, to complete our statistics for the year ending September 30, 1907, for want of the proper figures from certain poor districts. The law requires that returns be furnished "in such manner and at such times" as this Board shall direct, prescribing a penalty for violation thereof. "A chain is no stronger than its weakest link," and we cannot wind up our work until every return is received. If all the almshouse districts were as derelict in their duty as many are, we should be obliged to give up our work on almshouse statistics. I would add that we have recently been obliged to appeal to President Judges and District Attorneys to help us to secure the required data from ten or more districts. In fact we find it necessary, every year, to appeal in a number of instances to the legal authorities, after having made every effort to procure the data ourselves. We see no good reason why the proper records should not be kept so that the requirements of the law may be complied with in every almshouse district. If tne fault rests in part with our forms and they are not understood, then the agents of the Board can visit the institutions where doubt exists and afford the information desired.

On May 12th last, Mr. Amos W. Butler, Secretary of the Board of State Charities of Indiana, delivered an address before the "National Conference of Charities and Correction," at Richmond, Va. In opening that address, he said: "A Board of Charities is a representative of the people. I speak of the unpaid, non-partisan organizations generally known in this country by this or a somewhat similar name. The institutions of the State belong to the people, and it is their right and duty to visit them, and see how they are conducted." This happily expressed idea applies with striking force to the Board of Public Charities of this Commonwealth, which Board reports to the Legislature, the representatives of the people.

For thirty-eight years your Pennsylvania Board of Charities has been doing its work quietly but thoroughly. It enlisted early in the fight against tuberculosis, and it was mainly due to the present President of the Board that Mr. Phipps became interested in the white plague fight that culminated in the consummation of the noble Phipps Institute. The Board has held a high and honorable position in the cause of charity, and the future will find it as ever in the van of scientific progress.

Mr. Wharton:—I will be glad to send an agent to your place any time and go over the matter with you, until the matter is fully understood. Our Board reports direct to the Legislature and recommends to the Legislature.

President Smith:—I think Mr. Wharton would be glad to answer any questions.

Col. Gould (Erie)—Does any member of the Board of Public Charities receive any compensation but their expenses?

Mr. Wharton:—No, none.

Col. Gould:—How much time does the Board of Public Charities give to a single item of investigating and reporting to the Legislature how much should be appropriated to the several institutions?

Mr. Wharton:—The institutions that apply for State aid are first notified by the clerks; certain days and hours are fixed in different parts of the State; the applicants then come before the Board and make their plea for State aid. The Board considers it, and sometimes it takes but a few minutes to dispose of a case, or it may be held under advisement.

Col. Gould:—How many institutions are there that they recommend for?

Mr. Wharton:—We have to inspect about 600 State institutions.

Col. Gould:—How many in the simple matter of making appropriations?

Mr. Wharton:—Somewhere about 200 this year, I think.

Col. Gould:—And the Board is expected to make all that careful investigation to inform the Legislature as to what they should do in each case, without any compensation?

Mr. Wharton:—Yes. The last Legislature granted us two agents. We have adopted new forms by which we try to ascertain, as much as possible, before they come to us, and make every Superintendent swear to what he states; so if there is any question of graft we can reach it.

Col. Gould:—Have the Board adopted any standard rule of how they should appropriate, to hospitals that are not under State control, that they have to investigate and report how much they should give them. We know that sometimes the smaller institutions get more than the larger ones. Does the Board have any established rule governing that?

Mr. Wharton:—Yes, they try their best. We simply recommend to the Legislature. A gentleman who comes from a locality where there is a hospital is very apt to stand up for that hospital. We try to do what is right, but we cannot always control the Legislature. We try, where there is a deserving hospital, to figure out the per capita and cost, the number of patients treated, etc., and where a hospital is doing good work and is not exacting money from anyone we try to help that hospital; but we may be overthrown by the Legislature.

James J. Barnhart (Fayette)—You refer to the fact that there is great difficulty in getting reports. Is that because of negligence or because the institutions have inadequate records?

Mr. Wharton:—I think it is both. Sometimes it is the fault of the records and sometimes maybe because the forms are not understood. If there is any institution where the forms are not understood if they will write to us we will send our agents around to explain them, or we will try to simplify the form. I am trying to bring the Board of Charities in touch with the charities of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Barnhart:—Do you recommend any standard system for these institutions to get to make out their reports?

Mr. Wharton:—That is a good idea. It might be a good plan to get the idea of some good State institution.

Dr. Baker:—I have been nine years trying to make out a return for out-door relief. I fail to understand your sheet for out-door relief.

Mr. Wharton:—I doubt very much if I understand it myself. I have in mind now a more simple form. I think our agents will collect that information, instead of so much writing.

Mr. F. H. Nibecker (Glen Mills):—It seems to me that the first thing that the State Board of Charities might do to simplify the returns of the finances of those who receive State aid would be to make it correspond with the form used by authority of the Auditor General.

Mr. Wharton:—Our fiscal year is now the same as the State fiscal year.

Mr. Nibecker:—I refer to the fact that in the financial returns you must classify certain things. The Auditor General has a blank that has certain qualifications; then comes the State Board of Charities with an entirely different classification. It ought to be unified.

Mr. Wharton:—We ought to get together with the Auditor General on that matter. The institutions have had a different fiscal year. Now we are trying to get every institution that receives aid have the same fiscal year as the State.

A Voice:—In filling out the report, whose place is it to fill out the report of the year, before the new officer takes charge, for instance, 1907? Our own was sent back and we were notified by the District Attorney. Whose place would it be to make out that report?

Mr. Wharton:—I should think that would be a question for the District Attorney to settle. I cannot go into a question of who is in office or who is out of office.

Q.—Why was that kept back so long and not sent in in time to have it made out. It never came back to us until lately.

Mr. Wharton:—Did you write about it?

Delegate:—We sent in the report, why was it held so long before it was sent back?

Mr. Wharton:—I do not recollect the case.

Same Delegate:—How long do you hold the reports before they are sent back?

Mr. Wharton:—They ought to be sent right back. If you will write me the facts in your case I will find out why it was held, and let you know.

Applause.

The Elwyn Band again favored the convention with music.

President Smith here announced the following Committee on the resolution offered by Mr. Mackin:

D. A. Mackin, Luzerne; James McB. Robb, Pittsburg; Frederick Fuller, Scranton; J. P. H. Ranor, Carbondale; L. C. Colborn, Somerset; W. C. Grube, Lancaster; John J. Gheen, Chester county.

Dr. J. Lewis Srodes, Superintendent of Hospital at Woodville, Pa., was here introduced and read the following interesting paper:

THE EFFECT OF THE RECENT ACT OF ASSEMBLY FOR THE PREVENTION OF HYDROPHOBIA.

Dr. Srodes:—It was understood when this matter was presented to me that it was to be in the form of a discussion, and I was to have the honor of presenting it for that purpose. I will read the original Act, and the amended Act that we may all understand what it is.

Dr. Srodes here read the original Act and the amended Act and the following interesting paper, which was received with applause:

AN ACT

Section 1. Be it enacted, etc., that section one of "An Act providing for necessary medical attention to persons who may be in danger of suffering from hydrophobia," one thousand nine hundred and five, which reads as follows:

Section 1. Be it enacted, etc. That in each and every county of this Commonwealth it shall be the duty of the proper officers of the several poor districts, in such counties, to provide all needy persons, in their said several districts, who may be bitten by dogs suffering from hydrophobia, or rabies, with the proper medical attention to prevent the development of the disease in the person or persons so bitten, which medical attention may include the treatment known as the Pasteur treatment," be altered and amended so as to read as follows:

Section 1. Be it enacted, etc., That in each and every county of this Commonwealth, it shall be the duty of the proper officers of the several poor districts, in such counties, at the expense of such poor districts, respectively, to provide all persons who may apply for aid in their said several districts, who may be bitten by dogs or other animals suffering from hydrophobia, or rabies, with the proper medical attention to prevent development of the disease in the person or persons so bitten, which medical attention may include the treatment known as the Pasteur treatment.

Approved the 7th day of May, A. D. 1907.

EDWIN S. STUART.

The original intention of this Act as it was first drawn was to place within the reach of all a means of receiving prompt attention and prevention against this terrible disease, but it was found that the wording of the original Act brought about a class distinction to such an extent as to prevent its practical application as a law. A rabid dog or animal fails to recognize the social or financial standing of those who come in his way and would bite a good Republican just as quickly as a Democrat or Prohibitionist. The original Act made it possible for all needy persons to receive aid in getting prompt treatment and the question was raised in many cases as to whether they actually needed help and in some it might have been raised as to whether there wasn't some help coming to the dog, at any rate it was found to be practically useless. The law at present is that the proper officers of the several poor districts at the expense of such poor districts, shall provide all persons who may apply for aid.

No one will have the temerity to question the worth of such a law, but as the Directors of the Poor will have the burden of its administration it might be well at this meeting to take the initial steps in divising a uniform method for so doing, and avoid if possible an endless amount of litigation, due to its improper enforcement. Some of our counties are already in the Courts and the rest will follow just as fast as the dogs get loose. And in many of the cases that have occurred in Allegheny county it developed before the case was settled that it was not the dog but the Poor Board that was mad.

The medical profession are almost a unit in the opinion that the Pasteur treatment is the proper treatment for the prevention of rabies, and if the Courts sustain them in this opinion, then the question will simply be one of price and this will vary until fixed by law or a Court decision as to what amount shall be regarded as a fair compensation for this treatment. It ranges now from one hundred dollars up, and in many cases the patients are admitted and in addition to what they pay themselves, bills for $125 and $160 are rendered to the Directors of the Poor for settlement. And when you consider the fact that in one county alone in this State, in the very first year of the existence of this law, more than two hundred cases have been treated, you will understand that the burden will be very great and unless prompt attention is given to this feature and some safeguard provided for your poor funds, in a very few years our citizens will retire from the Poor Boards and will be running around coaxing the dogs to bite them.

Unless a further amendment be made to this Act, it may afford such opportunities for graft as to force its repeal. Could not the State Department of Health assist in the expense of its enforcement. Vast sums of money have been expended by the State for the prevention of small-pox, tuberculosis, diphtheria and other contagious and infectious diseases, why not add rabies to the list or at least could we not so amend this Act that the proper authorities could collect from the owners of the innumerable curs that infest our communities a tax as they do from sportsmen who keep valuable hunting dogs and are compelled to take out a license or submit to having their dogs shot while in the field.

We will never wipe out the epidemic of rabies sweeping over our State by the establishment of Pasteur Institutes at such a tremendous expense unless we begin by removing the cause and that is the dog.

A discussion on "Relief During Epidemics" was here opened by Mr. J. O. Smith, of Erie, who said:

This question of relief is one that the Poor Boards and Health Boards will find is very important. An epidemic is liable to start in any section of the State, at any time, and liable to become dangerous, and it isn't very long after it starts before there must be some relief. That is where the interesting part comes, for the Boards. We are so healthy in our part of the State, that we seldom have anything of this kind, so we are out of date on this question. We hope to remain so. There has no large number of people been thrown on the charity of the different boards there, in one or two lifetimes. But whether the number is small or large they must be attended to. I am glad to have some of the State officers here. I find that there may be two or three Boards acting along the same lines, but may be taking different courses in regard to relief during epidemics. In the southern portion of the State some of the Boards say the Board of Health has nothing to do with it; that the Poor Board attends to it. They say, "Our doctors and agents report to us, and we take charge of the case, of the families, and see that they are provided for until they can take care of themselves." Other places they say that the Directors of the Poor haven't anything to do with it, at all; that the School Board takes charge of it, and they say, "We aren't paying much attention to it."

The last law on the subject seems to have been plain enough so the different Boards would be acting along the same lines. Somebody must be wrong. We should know, before there is any great epidemic in the State, whether we are paying out the taxpayers' money in a lawful manner. I am glad the Secretary of the Board of Public Charities is here. When we have had a few cases of small-pox and it started among the scholars in the schools the Board of Health has taken charge of them. It would seem that if a bad epidemic should start it would be necessary to have the Poor Board take charge of it and see to the relief. In the last cases in Erie county our doctors and agents notified us that such a family is sick, and the law is fixed so there is an agent of the Board of Health, and he quarantines the family, and we have to furnish them with the sinews of war until they can take care of themselves whether or not it is according to law. I am ready to hear from other members.

Dr. Stewart (Lancaster):—I was particularly interested in the remarks of Dr. Srodes. He has given us the gist of the matter in the control of hydrophobia. It is well settled that the Pasteur treatment is the only treatment. It is even beyond contradiction that the great source of hydrophobia in human subjects is in the dog or the cat.

There are countless numbers of worthless curs tramping our streets. This afternoon we were interrupted by the barking of a cur in the streets here who gets his livelihood by tramping the alleys of the town; not only a useless attachment to society but a menace to public health. Overturning the slop buckets and allowing the contents to run on the ground and contaminate the atmosphere. I hold that in order to do away with a large number of cases of hydrophobia the thing to do is what Dr. Srodes suggests, do away with the worthless cur. It is in the power of the Poor Boards to urge upon the officers in their districts to remove dogs that are of no use, for my part I know of very few that are of any use.

There are in the poorer sections of every city people whose children are in a great measure charges upon charity, but they will hold on to the dog. Is it not within the province of the Poor Boards and the officers of the law to take charge of such dogs?

In regard to the control of epidemics, the burden has been placed on the Poor Boards, by the recent Act of the Legislature. As far as the expense is concerned, relative to the district in which the epidemic may originate, under the school laws of Pennsylvania that is entailed on the several districts.

Before the recent Acts it was within the duty of the School Board to provide funds during an epidemic. So the matter of expense is not a new imposition.

L. C. Colborn (Somerset):—These physicians who are talking about dogs remind me of a story about a Jew. He failed in business and he called his creditors together and he says: "Now, shentlemens, I gives you evertings I got," and one of them stood up and says, "Very well, I will take your gall," and he answered, "Vat, would you take my stock in trade away from me?" If you shoot all the dogs it will be hard on the doctors; we will have no hydrophobia. Under the law dogs are personal property, and you have as much property in a dog as you have in a horse. There is a tax; if you don't pay it it is the officers of the law who are responsible for the worthless curs about our streets. The owners of good dogs will see to it that their taxes are promptly paid, and the dogs tagged. Then the officials have the number of the dog, and if anything goes wrong the owner is responsible.

I have a dog at home. I don't know what good he is, but nevertheless we think as much of it as of any member of the family (Applause). He is not a common cur; but he wouldn't even deign to visit a swill tub for his food.

In regard to the second question, that has worried this Association and every Director of the Poor since we have had Boards. In every community we will some time have an epidemic of some kind. It has been going the rounds of the papers that at the end of this present drought, when the rains set in and the germs from the dried up rivers and creeks are floating in the air and arising from stagnant pools, we will have an epidemic of typhoid fever. I don't know of any scourge as bad as that. I pity the family that may be visited with this terrible disease. I have always advised the Directors of the Poor, in such epidemics, not to stay the hand a moment in giving relief, and not to question too closely whether or not it was necessary. That is what you are there for; to relieve the poor and to make all provision necessary for the care and maintenance of the poor. I hope that every Director will err on the side of giving too much at such time rather than in not giving at all, or giving too little.

Dr. Emmens (Somerset):—I am sorry David Harum isn't here. He said a certain number of fleas were good for dogs, because it kept them from worrying that they were a dog (Laughter).

This subject interests every one. It interests those who haven't got dogs, because they are liable to be bitten, and it interests you who own dogs because you are liable to be bitten, and also because that dog, who has become a friend of the family and who is the never-failing friend of every one, is liable to be bitten and become infected himself.

A dog is good as a hunting instrument; he is good as a pet, and we get a certain amount of pleasure by owning a good dog. It is not the purpose of this discussion to do away with dogs in general, because they are valuable, but to do away with the worthless creatures that run our streets and are a menace to society. I lost a very good pet that was bitten by a mad dog. I remember how I used to hate the dog catcher, a man who came around with a net or a gun, to shoot or catch every dog that was not licensed and had a tag on his collar, and I remember when I said, "If he ever shoots my dog, I will shoot him." But the dog catcher is appointed to protect us, and to protect valuable dogs from disease. Hydrophobia is a disease that is common to dogs, also to cats, or it may be contracted from a wolf. It is not only contracted from the bite of a dog, but it may be from the scratch of a rabid dog. It is common for a dog affected with rabies to scrape away at his mouth trying to tear away something or other, and in this way get the virus on its claws, and through a scratch of the claws he may affect you.

There is something you should all know about hydrophobia and the bite of a rabid dog. Hydrophobia does not develop in a day or two after the bite; it usually takes weeks, sometimes months, and in a few cases as long as a year, for the symptoms of the disease to develop.

It is a common practice everywhere when one is bitten by a dog whether the dog be mad or not, to immediately kill the dog. That is the worst thing you can do. Very often when a dog bites that is suffering from hydrophobia, it may not show the actual disease, and if you kill the dog you kill the means by which you can make your own diagnosis. You can depend upon it that if you permit that dog to live for a week to ten days, if he has hydrophobia he will show the symptoms and will die. No dog gets hydrophobia and lives.

If the dog lives you have nothing to fear. If he shows the symptoms of the disease cage him up where you can keep him under observation. If in a week to ten days he dies he has hydrophobia. If he gets well you have nothing to fear. If it dies it is your duty to seek treatment at once at some institution which gives the Pasteur treatment. By taking that you can generally overcome the rabies of the the disease before they appear.

It is your duty to try and protect yourselves and to protect your animals from hydrophobia. The first thing is to do away with the worthless dogs that are owned by no one, and which are generally the ones that contract hydrophobia.

(Applause.)

Mr. Ochse:—The money matter of hydrophobia seems to have been overlooked in this discussion. We have had a number of cases in our county this last year. We hope the Legislature will pass an amendment to the present Act, so that all expenses will not devolve on the county effected. If a man owns a dog who bites a person you cannot collect from him. The law says the Poor Board must pay for it.

In regard to killing the dog, they require them to bring the head of the dog to the institution. True, the people make a mistake by doing that. By keeping the dog for a week or ten days they would know whether the dog had rabies.

One of our Directors started out to look up a case and he ran against eight cases, all bitten by that one dog. It is a serious matter, and the Act should be changed in some way, either to compel some person to kill all dogs that are not registered or not provided for, or some other plan. I don't think it is right for the Poor Board to be compelled to pay for it, no matter whose dog it is..

Frank H. Yost, Somerset:—

About the legal aspect of this question; what the last gentleman said interested me very much. Under the first Act several persons from Somerset were sent and treated at the Mercy Hospital. We got a bill for several hundred dollars and it wasn't paid at the time; afterwards it was dropped. Shortly afterwards we sent others up and we paid the bills. I am satisfied the Act isn't what we want. If it were tested I think it would be found to be in conflict with the Poor Laws, for by the provisions of the Act it is made mandatory on the Poor Board to pay for the treatment of any person bitten by a dog supposed to be mad. That couldn't be said to be the law, because the person might be worth thousands of dollars and yet it would be the duty of the Poor Board to pay for his treatment.

It seems to me that the great trouble is that the cost of this treatment is too high. If that is the trouble that part of it should be changed. If the circumstances spoken of by the last gentleman should confront our Board, as solicitor, I would test the constitutionality of the Act.

It is very important that persons bitten by dogs affected with rabies should be promptly and properly treated, but I think the Act should be changed.

(Applause).

Dr. Martin W. Barr, Superintendent Feeble Minded Institute at Elwyn, here read the following very able paper, which received generous applause:

SOME NOTES ON CAUSATION OF MENTAL DEFECT.

By Martin W. Barr, M. D., Chief Physician to the Pennsylvania Training School for Feeble-Minded Children, Elwyn, Pa.

In the study of the mentally defective and backward classes now attracting such universal attention, no subject is as frequently and eagerly discussed as that of cause and effect. My own experience, as that of all engaged in the work, is to meet the oft repeated question, "What is the cause of my child's condition?" The answer naturally involves a consideration of various factors of causation, which nature in her constant efforts to revert to original and healthy types, must meet either simply or in combination and too often vainly combat.

Heredity recognized in all ages, among all peoples as an acting dominating power in the progression or retrogression of races, is decried and repudiated by some, from a simple misunderstanding or misconception. Thus, a disease, or defect, or a weakness need not necessarily be reproduced in its exact form of, for example, tuberculosis, drunkenness or epilepsy; but during the daily intercourse and cohabitation of individuals thus affected, there may be, and often is, a coalition and interfusion producing an evil far worse than any of these, it may be idiocy, imbecility, or insanity. Or else there may be a blending of nerve tissue and fibre of such viscious quality as to produce a "poor make up," so to speak, in the offspring who, with no resisting power, succumbs easily to sudden attack or to the influences of unhealthful environment, too often transmitting its burden of accumulated ill. For, unfortunately, even among so-called respectable people the procreation of the human species, does not receive a tithe of attention given to that of horses, of flocks or of herds.

While the toleration of underbreeding on any stock farm would meet with sharp criticism, the affiliation of normal humanity with defectives goes on in all lands without protest, and, save only in a few States unrestrained by legal injunction.

During more than a century of the work of sequestration and care, the attention of those engaged in the task of amelioration and prevention has notably been drawn towards the subject of causation. Accumulated data drawn from family histories, carefully investigated, has in that time afforded foundation for authoritative opinion, and upon such basis, various studies have been made from time to time by alienists of repute—Seguin, Howe, Dahl, Grabham, Down, Ireland, Beach and Shuttleworth and others. With the aim of reducing yet more closely to concrete forms, carefully graduated tables of causation have been worked out on the Continent, in England and America, convenience dictating a division into three periods, or causes acting before, at the time of, and after birth. All agree in finding heredity the most fruitful cause.

In my own personal investigation of 4050 cases, I find by far the greatest number of cases presented, 2651, or 65.45 per cent. traceable to causing acting before birth; those at the time of birth show only 186, or 4.59 per cent.; while those after birth amount to 1213 or 29.96 per cent.

In the first period I find the largest number, 1030, or 25.43 per cent. due to an inheritancy of idiocy and imbecility direct. Nothing is so readily transmitted as defect and unless strongly counterbalanced by an infusion of pure blood, its lack of resisting power and early affiliation with other neuroses continually intensify it. Often in spite of prepotency the trait lingers, and in the fourth or fifth generation, there will be a physiological housecleaning and a degenerate is bound to appear.

In the majority of instances, however, the heredity is defect as in a case coming under my observation, both parents being wholly defective—the father only 38 years of age—there are no less than 19 defective children; another shows eight microcephalic idiots, and yet another from similar stock, numbers 34 imbeciles in three generations. In another family the mother an idiot, has given birth to seven idiot children.

The abnormal condition of mothers during gestation is responsible for 352, or 8.69 per cent. Among my cases, poverty, hard work, worry, etc., all combine to produce idiocy, as does also any sudden or violent shock, mental or physical. For instance, the wife of an official in the government service, present at the siege of Tangier, where cannonading went on for three days continually, gave birth to an imbecile child.

The ill effect of a tubercular connection is not to be underestimated.

I find it a factor both near and remote through several generations, and responsible for 308, or 7.60 per cent.

Drs. Shuttleworth and Beach find about the same—7.57 per cent.

Insanity as a permeating, penetrating disease is responsible for 280, or 6.91 per cent. of my cases. In a study of seven generations, numbering 173 individuals, sprung from one insane man, I find 25 neurotics, 9 violently insane, 3 imbeciles, and 10 still-born children, in all 47 abnormal cases.

Intemperance, while really exaggerated as a single factor, is, nevertheless, recognized as a contributing agent. I find it in 233 cases, or 5.75 per cent., generally in combination with some of the various neuroses. In England, Shuttleworth and Beach find it in 390 cases, or 16.38 per cent. In Norway, according to Ludvig Dahl, it is a pronounced cause.

Ruez observed idiocy common among the miners of Westphalia, who living apart from their wives, return home only on holidays and then generally drunk.

Delasiame says that at Cerene, whose wealth is in its vineyards, the inhabitants, in consequence of a ten years vine disease, were forced to remain sober, and of children born during this period, mental defect was appreciably lessened.

On the other hand, in Scotland and on the coast of Normandy, where whole villages, prior to the setting out of the men for the fishing grounds, get drunk at once, one would expect in nine months a crop of idiot children, but such is not the case.

While it cannot be denied that the toxic action of alcoholism in the father may be a direct cause of idiocy; one must also consider the associated cause, viz.: the consequent condition of the mother. In a certain museum, are the casts of seven microcephalic idiot heads; the father, keeper of a public house, a man of some intelligence, was nevertheless a dipsomaniac, causing his wife continual worry and anxiety. These children were not only conceived in drunkenness, but grew into being under abnormal conditions. Later, the father deprived of drink, a child, perfect in every way, was born.

A confirmed drunkard, was the father of 16 children; 15 died of convulsions in infancy; one only, an epileptic, lived. The mother dying, the father married again. Of this marriage there were eight children, seven of whom died of convulsions, and one was phthisical.

The minor neuroses in 130 cases or 3.21 per cent., show chorea, hysteria, sick headache, neuralgia and hyperchondrosis, which finding expression in violent tempers, ill-timed grief, or untimely mirth, prove a fruitful cause not only of mental, but of moral defect.

Weakened power of resistance leads to a lowering of moral tone indicated by indulgence in petty vices, irresponsibility and consequent inability to attain success in life. For example, one neurotic woman nervous, flighty and passionate, is reproduced in 10 of 18 descendants, six imbeciles and four early deaths; the modified condition of the others, points to some prepotency in a commingling of pure blood.

Epilepsy, directly transmitted, gives 119 cases or 2.49 per cent., and similarly cancer, 64, or 1.58 per cent.

In close connection with the subject of heredity, comes consanguinity, and probably no branch of it has given rise to more widely divergent views.

The consensus that accepts heredity as a primary factor or agent in the production of idiocy, fails to recognize consanguinity as a distinct and separate cause.

My investigations have been made with the greatest care and accuracy, all information involving any possible doubt, having been excluded, I find only 49 cases, or 1.21 per cent. Where the blood is pure and uncontaminated, there is no evil resulting from inter-marriage, if, however, the blood has ever so slight a taint, idiocy may (although not always) be the result. In my cases, two were the fruit of incestuous connection—one brother and sister—the other, father and daughter. Dr. Howe found 44 idiots in 17 consanguinous families, but the parents were also either scrofulous or intemperate.

In the commune of Batz, an isolated ocean-washed peninsula of the Loire Infericure, France, with an average population of 3000, leading simple, wholesome lives, among whom crime and intemperance are unknown, intermarriage has been common for hundreds of years and imbecility or indeed any form of defect is unknown; yet the number of children born is above the average.

In the causes acting before birth, are found in graduated proportion the heredities of Scrofula, Diseases of the Cardiovascular system, Syphilis, Goitre and attempted abortion.

In my second division, causes at birth, 186, or 4.59 per cent. The various influences retarding or hastening birth are of minor importance in comparison with the harmful results of instrumental delivery which I find in 74 instances, or 1.83 per cent. Difficult labor—tedious and prolonged, is found in 43 cases, or 1.06 per cent; premature birth, in 39, or .96 per cent. and the various accidents at birth in 30, or .74 per cent.

Causes acting after birth, 1213, or 29.96 per cent., are summed up under the head of accidents and the various diseases.

Of these I find epilepsy in excess, 273 cases, giving 6.74 per cent. Indeed I have come to regard epilepsy as but another phase of certain and contiuous degeneration; and that the majority of cases of convulsions occurring in infancy or early childhood and referred to by physicians as eclampsia, are in reality epilepsy; held in abeyance it may be for years, but sooner or later—usually about the period of puberty—the spasms will return with renewed force and frequency.

Injury to head from falls or blows, I find in 229 cases, or 5.65 per cent. A child may be born normal, and the carelessness of a nurse defeat all that nature had planned.

Acute diseases: pleurisy, pneumonia, malarial and ephemeral fevers, 145, or 3.58 per cent., have been esteemed causes. These being the only ones assigned, insufficient data of other character required their acceptance, but I feel well assured that in the majority of cases, some latent neurosis, or neurotic tendency and lack of resisting power was the true cause, and the disease only an exciting agent; the defect present, but latent and unsuspected until the acute attack precipitated its development. The same might be said of other causes which appear in ever lessening gradation of less than 1 per cent.: Abuse, neglect, exposure, gastro-intestinal diseases, masturbation, isolation and diphtheria. Meningitis and scarlatina present a nearly equal ratio—the one in 110 cases, giving 2.72 per cent.; the other in 99 cases, giving 2.45 per cent.

Not to detain you too long, I have given as succinctly as possible these data relating to the causation of idiocy and imbecility—data based upon continuous comparison and persistent research through many years.

A concensus among students in many lands confirms conclusively the opinions reached, viz.: that any malnutrative condition tending to prevent, arrest or retard development in the human species, must result in idiocy or imbecility. As provocation of such condition the hereditary causes acting singly or in combination are most potent. Heredity is here proven law; heredity, whether direct or indirect, as inexorable as death itself.

Science has done its part in showing cause, and the light leads us to a parting of the ways. To quote the very pertinent title of a recent English publication, "Race Culture; or Race Suicide," which shall be the trend of good citizenship in the coming future?

In Europe—Austria, Servia and Italy lead in forbidding the marriage of degenerates. England does not forbid marriage, but makes sexual intercourse with a married degenerate, a penal offense.

In the Americas—the Argentine Republic and the States of Michigan, Minnesota, Indiana and North Dakota, have legislative enactments against the marriage of degenerates and those afflicted with hereditary diseases.

Connecticut goes further in forbidding intercourses tending to the procreation of epilepsy and imbecility.

Delaware forbids the intermarriage of paupers, but the act makes no mention of degenerates.

Pennsylvania has twice vainly voiced the will of her people in Legislative action legalizing asexulization of those adjudged imbecile by proper authority. Meanwhile the necessity for three large and many small institutions, shows an ever increasing burden of degenerate folk within her borders.

That the true end of segregation and separation in asylums is largely frustrated by the sending out of the imbecile unrecognizable or unfit for self-control or self-protection, there can be no question.

Equally true is it that the only solution of the problem of such dissemination is to be found in asexualization. Once adopted as a preventive of race suicide, and a means of race culture, the public mind will readily adopt itself to it, as merely a new system of quarantine carrying us forward to yet higher ideals in the procreation of humanity.

Naturally after clearing a defective strain, the next step must be the cultivation of higher qualities in the individual with the one aim of ennobling posterity and elevating the race.

President Smith here introduced Dr. Carl Kelsey, of the University of Pennsylvania, who was received with applause and addressed the convention as follows:

"RETURNS FOR MONEY EXPENDED FOR PUBLIC AND PRIVATE CHARITIES."

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen:

I feel in a more or less embarrassing position, being at the tail of a long program. I did my best to get out of it. You must not expect to learn very much from me this afternoon, for I was requested to speak without even being asked if I knew anything about the subject, about which I probably know less than many of you. My topic is, "Returns for Money Expended for Public and Private Charities." I speak not as the active executive of a charitable society, but as a student, teaching others, and therefore interested in the returns, from the work we do in the community.

It boils itself down to a question of efficiency. We are still a new country. We have had a wealth of opportunities for everyone who wanted to do anything. Moreover, back of the settled region has been an enormous area of uncultivated land that could be had by any one. We have had the generosity that always accompanies a new and rising civilization; the belief that there could be no such thing as permanent poverty, in a country situated as ours; the belief that such poverty as we had was a purely transitory matter to be met by some temporary measures, and when that belief has been given out we might trust to natural events to enable the family to go along with the rest of the community. Our whole theory of philanthropy, until the last generation, has been that of merely palliative measures; that if we met the needs of the day that was sufficient and all we had to do.

What is the result? No one really knows anything about the extent of poverty, even in his own community. You think you do, but I challenge you to put it down in black and white so I can use it before my classes, that is, anything more than your own impressions. We haven't a single record on poverty and crime that is worth that (a snap of the finger) from the student's standpoint.

Accurate returns for the work we have done in philanthropy are simply not available. There is nothing that is more evident than the lack of statistics. You say statistics lie. I ask who make them, honest men or liars? The trouble with the lying statistics is that the men who made them haven't had evidence and training enough to make them accurately. The result of that is that you and I, to-day, entering on any great policy of relief have very little to guide us as to the probable outcome of the measures we are about to inaugurate, except general impressions. Your medical men know what general impressions are worth as to the causes of the disease. Supposing I take illustrations from other fields. It chances that I am a taxpayer in this county. One-half of the taxes I pay go to the roads. Is there any way for me to find how that money is used, or whether it is wisely used? We haven't yet developed a sentiment that is strong enough to make sure that the men we put in to build roads know anything about roads. We turn in the money to the Supervisors, and then ride over the roads they build. In one district you will find good roads, and in another district miserable roads. Within a half mile of my home, on an old macadamized road, where they should use but stone, they have put in tons and tons of dirt.

I was called on last spring by the representative of a large movement in the State, to pass critical judgment on an argument made by a State official. He claimed that his own returns for his first year are absolutely accurate and reliable. Queer as it seems, however, he did not use the returns for his own first year, he went back to the returns of the last year of his predecessor, which he claims are unreliable. He then guessed what his predecessor should have said and on this guess bases his own argument. Had he taken the returns for his own first year he could not have proven his point.

I went into a public office in Philadelphia and asked for their returns. I pointed out to the man at the desk the heavy increase in the death rate for a certain time and asked him to explain it. He looked at it and said, "In the first place there were more deaths." I thought that was true. I went in May to the office of a gentleman who spoke this afternoon and asked him for the returns of the State institutions that I may make a report to the National Conference of Charities and Correction. I could not get the figures for the fiscal year ending in 1906. The office claims that you, gentlemen, do not do your duty. At least we cannot find out, as we should be able to, what is going on.

Take up our school system. How many of you know, except in a general way, whether the children of the community are in the schools? I guarantee there is no district in the State but what some of the children are slipping through our fingers. Yet we say the school system is the basis of our educational program. Do you realize how poorly it prepares them for life when it lets them go at the seventh or eighth grades, to go to work? Do you know that only about five per cent. of children ever get to the High Schools and colleges? You wonder why the children going through the schools go into professional work or something else rather than to learn to run a farm. Do you know a public school of this State that will teach a boy how to run a farm, or where an effort is made to hold the farmer's life on as high a plane as a professional life? It is only the country magazines, published in the cities that hold up ideals of country life. The boys would rather be street car conductors than to live on the old place.

We have beautiful penal institutions, from which the people rarely escape. Do you know that more than 50 per cent. of those inmates have already served prison terms? What is the matter with our institutions? Does a man like prison life so much that he wants to come back? Are we developing a criminal class in our public institutions? Do you know that every student of the question says you might as well put over the door of every county jail, "Training School for Crime?"

We boast of our reformatories, and they sometimes advertise 85 per cent. of the young men reformed. I doubt if there is a reformatory that keeps track of 85 per cent. of those that were there five years ago. How can they tell then what becomes of prison inmates. There is not a prison man in the country that really knows what his institution is doing, and he has no way, under our American customs, of finding out. You could not get Mr. Nibecker to make any such statement of the result of his institution.

We have our children's institutions and we say that the children that have been in orphan asylums are placed in homes are doing wonderfully well. We say they are visited once a year, regularly. I would like to know how many children's institutions there are which have visited their children once a year. I have gone through institution after institution and examined their records and I can assure you that they cannot show by their records that they visit the children once a year. Maybe they do, but their records don't show it. I am not criticising the institutions, but merely their returns.

I have gone to a Superintendent and asked him to let me see the correspondence and records about a certain child: "I cannot give it to you." Why not? "It is all in there," and he would point me to a room about as big as this and say, "It is all scattered through the files." If I wanted to know to-day what had become of a child placed out twenty years ago by some of the best institutions of the country it would take an expert weeks to even find out what the institution knew.

I have seen this record on the books of an organization that places children out carefully: "This child placed with a family well known to the officers of the society, but for personal reasons the name of the family is not inserted in the record." Now the officials die, or change, and no one can find where that child is. I leave it to you whether or not this is good business.

Take our County Almshouses. For evidence I am going outside of our State. I have in my hand a recent investigation of a small almshouse in a neighboring State, which shows that from 1887 to 1899 the cost of caring for the poor was $1200 annually. From 1900 to 1907 the annual cost has been $890. That is a saving of more than 25 per cent. to the taxpayers. It was done by the introduction of business methods. Take our outdoor relief. I don't stand for a moment as opposing it in principle; I think it is a difficult thing to administer wisely, in spite of the seeming ease with which the amateur can do it. But I do criticise, in this country generally, our records relative to outdoor relief. In most places it is impossible to find what was done ten years ago. The incoming Board of Supervisors cannot find what their predecessors did. There are no books kept that will give the information they should have. You can't find how long a given family has been relieved, the cost of any particular case, or the reasons which led to the giving of relief. I have reason to believe that in the town above referred to that the chairman of the Board of Supervisors had been for years charging many bad bills to the town. He was a merchant and when he couldn't collect a bill he charged it to the public account. The man didn't look upon it as dishonest, and there is no way of doing anything about it.

I have seen entries like this, "H. B. W., for keeping families, services as selectman, and work on the road, $41.00." Please audit that account and find what the paupers got. "H. B. W., 150 feet of plank, and care of transient paupers, $4.50." How can you audit that?

I am not interested at all in stingy methods. I want the work well done, but I want it efficiently done, with as little cost as is compatible with efficiency. Indiana has had a revival in the last ten or twelve years on this question and the actual expense for out-door relief is vastly less than it was then, in spite of the increase of population, because the Supervisors have adopted uniform methods.

Now, what improvements do we need? We need, in the first place, a realization on the part of all of us who have anything to do with philanthropic work, that we have got to take an account of stock. Do you know anything of the foreign publications? They put us to shame. From a little town in Holland I can get more accurate information of what is done in these regards than we can get here, while Denmark has a better system than we have.

I can get from one of those places a statement that cannot be duplicated in the United States. If you go into one of our big business houses you find that they have their accounts analyzed so carefully that they can tell the extra fraction of per cent. per ton that it costs to move certain material they are dealing in. Business men do not put money into things that don't pay. If we would put the business methods into our philanthropic work that is put into other kinds of business we could work revolutions in the results.

I think we might utilize more freely the experience of other communities. I am glad that to-night we will have a man of national reputation in the care of children to speak to us, Mr. Hart. It will be well to heed what he says. He is this year making a special investigation of the methods of caring for dependent children.

Few people realize how difficult it is to get statements that can be exhibited as reliable. Mrs. Russell Sage has given $10,000,000 to the Sage Foundation, the interest of which is to be used for the investigation of causes of distress and for the stimulating of better methods of work. It will study the problems of poverty in order that the burden of poverty may be reduced. We should co-operate with all such agencies.

There is another thing I must speak of, everybody knows that appropriations to institutions in this State are largely on the log-rolling basis; that is, thoroughly bad. As long as the subsidy system is the policy of the State we should all, from whatever part of the State we come, insist that those institutions that are carrying the burden of the State should be generously and loyally supported. There are, however, a great raft of local institutions, I care not how individually valuable they may be, that do not have that significance for the State at large. They stand on a very different basis. Some one ought to investigate the subject of public appropriations to these institutions. We want our wealth used wisely. To-day we cannot find that it is being used wisely; we cannot find that these appropriations are wise and are justified by the needs of the State. We tend to view the problem from a local rather than a State standpoint. We are not in a position to know what are the results of many of our institutions in which we have the greatest pride and faith. We can never satisfy ourselves, as students or as executives, unless we go to work in a way that we know our work is effective. The responsibility is on us to see that our work is done efficiently and we must not be satisfied until we can show that it is well done to persons who have the right to make the inquiry of us. I thank you for listening so long and so patiently.

Applause.

Mr. Colborn:—I see with us this afternoon one you have all heard of, and I want to introduce her, that she may speak to you for a minute or two. I have the pleasure of introducing Mrs. A. B. Parsels, of Philadelphia, who comes as a delegate from Women's Christian Temperance Union.

Mrs. Parsels was received with applause and said:

Mr. Chairman and Friends:

I bring to you the greeting of twenty thousand women of Pennsylvania and the personal greeting of three hundred delegates lately assembled in State Convention, at Sharon, Pa. Our organization tries to give relief to the down trodden; to the one who has become a pauper; to the one who has become a felon; yet our name suggests that back of it we see the great cause for 75 per cent. at least of the pauperism and the degeneracy, and we are trying to get at the root of the matter, by localizing and making less, even to the matter of compulsion, this great cause of pauperism and degeneracy, and that will compel men and women to obey God's law and the civil law. It is my pleasure to enter the jails in the different counties, where I meet so many of the lads, and they say to me, sometimes, "You are from Philadelphia, when you see my mother or my grandmother tell her it was all through liquor that I am here." We want the law as to liquor executed the same as the pure food law and the law of vaccination. We want the dog sweetly chloroformed and put to sleep, when he has no master. We wish that men and women would be compelled to obey the law.

After visiting one of your county jails, in July, where they are building an extravagant wing, I said to the warden, haven't you gotten the idea that our organization has, that in four or five years we will scarcely want jails or jailers in this State or other States, the way they are going so completely dry? I had just come from Dover, Delaware (Applause). Let me tell you there is a ray of hope. There is scarcely a cloud the size of a man's hand in Pennsylvania or in the Nation. This splendid American nation is pushing onward and upward. The gospel of Christ has left the touch of the Christ. God bless you in His work, as He does in all our work.

Applause.

The Convention here adjourned until to-morrow morning at nine o'clock.

On Tuesday evening, October 13th, the Committee of Arrangements and citizens of West Chester tendered to the delegates a most delightful banquet and reception, at Memorial Hall. The hall was tastefully decorated, and an elaborate menu was served by caterers from Germantown, at which over two hundred delegates sat down. After partaking of the banquet there was a "feast of reason and a flow of soul" and wit, at which Dr. J. Lewis Srodes, of Woodville, Pa., presided as toastmaster. The occasion proved a very happy one, and will long be remembered. Dr. Srodes kept everyone in a good mood, and the following toasts were happily responded to:

"Our Association"—President John L. Smith.

"Education vs. Pauperism"—Dr. G. M. Philips, Superintendent State Normal School at West Chester.

"Our Institutions"—Col. E. P. Gould, Erie.

"Our Hosts"—Mrs. E. S. Lindsey, Warren, Pa.

"Our Guests"—Mr. Wilmer W. MacElree, West Chester.

"Ourselves"—Frederick Fuller, Scranton.

"The Ladies"—Mr. L. C. Colborn, Somerset.

At the conclusion, Col. E. P. Gould proposed a vote of thanks to the people of West Chester, on behalf of the delegates, which was heartily given, and the delegates departed with the appreciation that they had found at West Chester a most cordial people.

MORNING SESSION—Wednesday, October 14, 1908.

The Convention was called to order at 9 a. m. as per adjournment, by President Smith.

Devotional exercises were conducted by Rev. Arthur H. Simpson.

Levi Thomas:—It seems to me that we should enter upon our minutes some expression of appreciation for the fine music that we had yesterday. I therefore move that a vote of thanks be extended to Dr. Barr and his band, for the music that they gave us yesterday.

The motion of Mr. Thomas was carried.

Mr. E. D. Sollenberger, General Secretary, here read the following report of the work of the Children's Aid Society of Pennsylvania, which was received with applause.

REPORT OF THE CHILDREN'S AID SOCIETY OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Edwin D. Sollenberger, General Secretary, 1506 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Since the organization of the Children's Aid Society of Pennsylvania in 1882 and its incorporation in 1883, the movement has grown and spread over the State so that now some twenty odd counties in the western part of Pennsylvania are organized into the Western Pennsylvania Children's Aid Society with headquarters at Pittsburg, while the counties of Huntingdon, Mifflin and Bedford, under the leadership of Prof. David Emmert, of Huntingdon, are perfecting a tri-county organization for placing and supervising dependent and neglected children, which promises much for the future of their work in Central Pennsylvania. In addition, a number of counties have independent Children's Aid Societies among which may be mentioned Chester, Franklin, Delaware, Bucks, Lancaster and Montgomery. Many of the remaining counties of the State place their dependent children through the Agency of the Children's Aid Society of Pennsylvania, having headquarters in Philadelphia. Naturally most of the children in our care have been received from the city and county of Philadelphia, but included among our wards at the present time are boys, girls and young infants from nineteen different Poor Boards representing various counties in Eastern Pennsylvania.

The work of each of these societies must be taken into account in making up a report of the present status of the work of the Children's Aid Societies in Pennsylvania. Even this would not include all of the placing-out work of children in the State, for many institutions, societies and agencies do some home-finding work for children coming into their care. Again in a few of the counties the Directors of the Poor do their own placing, while in Blair county they send their dependent and neglected children to the Blair County Home maintained by the County Commissioners by whose authority the children are placed in family homes after remaining in the institution for a greater or less length of time.

This brief statement is not intended to be a complete account of the present status of placing out work in our State, but rather a suggestion that many different groups of good Pennsylvanians are actively interested in home-finding work for dependent and neglected children. Therefore, in presenting a report of the Children's Aid Society of Pennsylvania (though the incorporate name may seem inclusive and exclusive) I wish to have the Society regarded as a member of a common family rather than an agency standing apart by itself.

The Society heartily believes in co-operation with other agencies in child-saving work, and it is anxious to be of whatever assistance it can in promoting co-operation not only among the child-helping agencies of Philadelphia, but also throughout the State of Pennsylvania. As an illustration of this, I may mention that for the five years ending December 31, 1907, we received from the Pennsylvania Society to Protect Children from Cruelty 530 children, and from the Juvenile Court, of Philadelphia, 333 children. We have also received children from a number of orphanges, children's homes, hospitals, the Philadelphia Society for Organizing Charity and various other agencies. All this is in addition to the children received from the Department and the Directors of the Poor of various counties.

The total number of children in the care of the Society September 30, 1908, was 1444. Of this number 610 were in boarding homes, a number of them only temporarily until we can find permanent, free homes for them. Others are children whose parents are responsible for their support either under private agreement or by order of the Court; therefore they cannot be given out for adoption or permanent placement. Still others are children who are boarding because their physical condition is such that desirable free homes cannot be readily found for them. Others are children whom we are willing to place for ultimate adoption and we are holding them until just the right home is found. Still others are boarding in homes under an agreement that they are to be taken free by their present care takers when the boy or girl reaches a certain age. We are trying to reduce the number of these latter cases because more and more we are anxious to find without delay permanent, free homes where our children may be accepted as a member of the family. We find it desirable, however, to have many different methods. There are so many different kinds of children and so many different kinds of homes that the best results are doubtless secured by taking each case individually and endeavoring to work out the best possible solution under the circumstances.

The remaining 834 children, which we have in our care in addition to the 610 boarding cases, are all subject to exactly the same supervision. Most of them are likely to be permanent members of the families in which they have been placed, but they are subject to removal by the Society whenever the welfare of the child demands it.

We have continued our policy of trying to avoid separation of mothers from their infants by finding them situations at domestic service usually in the country. This plan makes the mother self-supporting and secures her love and care for the child. To be effective, work of this character must be very carefully performed and much discrimination is needed in order to decide upon the best method in each individual case. During the year 1907 we found working homes for 587 destitute mothers each with one or two young children.

In the case of children whose board is paid by the Department of Public Health and Charities of the City of Philadelphia or by one of the Poor Boards in the State, as soon as we are able to find permanent, free homes, payment of board by the Poor Board is discontinued. The length of time required to accomplish this varies with the physical and mental condition of the child when received, its age and other circumstances. It is my belief that we can develop our work in the future so as to reduce the length of time during which it is necessary to board a child at the expense of the Directors of the Poor. In other words, I think that by a more systematically organized canvass of the State and by greater co-operation between the various counties, we may be able to find more desirable, permanent, free homes for these children than we have done in the past. I cannot pass this phase of the subject, however, without calling attention to the necessity which exists for meeting the expense of supervision of these children after they have gone into the so-called free homes. I have in mind now a boy whom we received from one of the Poor Boards in 1898. In 1899 a permanent, free home was found for him, but ever since that date our Society has kept in touch with the home, receiving quarterly reports from the pastor of the church where the boy attended Sunday School and monthly reports from the school teacher as well as making unannounced visits at least twice a year and sometimes oftener. I could cite scores of similar cases received from various Poor Boards.

Opinions differ in various parts of our State as to the best method of providing for expense of after-supervision in the case of children placed free. In the case of boarding children, the per capita payment by the Poor Boards does not cover the cost of supervision. It barely meets the actual expense of board and clothing and allows nothing for transportation and administrative and other expenses. It is just because the Children's Aid Societies throughout Pennsylvania are anxious to have and promote this co-operation with the various Poor Boards that I take this opportunity to emphasize the effort which we are making to provide for the expense of supervision and administration, hoping that it may encourage others. In addition to a few thousand dollars annual income from our comparatively small endowment, we are fortunate in having a number of annual subscribers to the work of this Society, the total amount contributed in 1907 being $15,040.00. In addition to this, the Directors of the Society made personal contributions to provide furniture and filing cases for the office and from private sources the Directors have also provided the salary for the full time of one person for two years and part time of another. We have also received the usual State aid regarding which you are familiar. I may say that we hope to increase the income of the Society by voluntary contributions and we hope also to increase our permanent endowment fund but even so, it is clear that the demands upon the Society are increasing at such a rate that we shall have to ask for more money from the State. However, we may feel as to the best method of "State Aid" in charitable work, we all recognize that the State has a duty to perform in helping to transform its dependent and neglected children into intelligent, virtuous and self-supporting citizens.

During the past year we have installed a complete new record system in our office. Under this system all applications received for children are indexed alphabetically under the name of the county from which they are received, and it is possible to see at a glance just how many applications have been received, accepted and rejected from each county. The application blank, the references and the written report of our agent, made after a personal visit to the home, are all filed alphabetically in a vertical folder where they are convenient of access at any time. We also make a record, indexed under the name of each child, of the name of the family with whom placed, the post office, railroad station, distance and direction of the home from the station and other items of information useful for purposes of visitation. On the back of this card are columns in which we keep a record of the visits made to each child. These cards are filed alphabetically by counties and towns and it is possible to see at once just where each child in the care of the Society is living. In order to keep a careful record of the church and Sunday School attendance of each child, we have still another card indexed under the name of the child, giving the school teacher's name and address and the pastor's name and address. We receive a quarterly report from the pastor with respect to church and Sunday School attendance and a monthly report from the school teacher giving information as to the condition of the health and clothing of the child, and particularly an itemized statement as to the scholarship record. All this is carefully entered on the back of the card and all delinquencies are carefully followed up by correspondence or personal visitation or both. When a child is received a history card is carefully made out and attached to it is a typewritten statement concerning the circumstances of the case. We make every effort to secure all possible information about the child that may be of use in dealing with the case.

We believe that it means something to become responsible for the environment, religious and mental training of a child and that the very best office record systems used in modern business are none too good to be used in child-helping work. By this emphasis upon the value of a good record system, I hope that I am not giving the impression that we rely upon machinery for our results, for after all, we are dealing with human relationships and success or failure of our work depends upon the intelligence, devotion and good understanding of those who are in actual contact with the children. The same results can be secured by different methods. The important thing is to have some way of selecting good homes and to have a safe and sure method of maintaining supervision necessary to guarantee the best results.

Mr. Sollenberger:—I have formed the impression that the work in Chester county is a model. I feel that the foundations that have been laid by the Society in Chester county, during the past year, are such that we can all follow them with profit. There is a growing impression throughout the State that there must be an extension of this work, in a thorough way, to include every county in the State.

The Convention was here favored with music by the band from the House of Refuge at Glen Mills, which was received with applause.

President Smith here called for the report of the School for Wayward Girls, of Indiana county.

Mrs. H. L. Rankin (Fayette):—Mrs. Willard wishes me to state that there seems to be a misunderstanding as to what this School is. It was established because we had girls turned over who had been placed out several times, but they had no training. This was established by a certain number of counties furnishing the money and buying it. It belongs to those counties. We never take more than eighteen girls at a time. There are two paid officers, the matron and the teacher. Mrs. Willard is Superintendent. She is very fond of girls and she acts in a mothery way toward them. They have no State aid and it is not a State institution.

Mrs. Sue Willard here read the report of the school just referred to, as follows, which was received with applause:

REPORT OF THE INDUSTRIAL HOME FOR GIRLS OF INDIANA, PENNA.

Notwithstanding the great similarity of the reports of each year's work in a home of this character, we believe it is of the utmost importance that all those who are interested in the welfare of our work should be kept informed of its progress and prospects for future usefulness.

It is indeed gratifying to be able to report a very successful year's work. Satisfactory progress has been made in all departments.

The matron and teacher have rendered faithful and efficient service; and our girls have shown a real interest and a spirit of willingness and cheerfulness, which is to be greatly commended.

The increased interest manifested by the people of our community in our work has also very much encouraged us.

The "home" and "social life" is a very important factor in the education of a child, and our aim and endeavor is (so far as possible), to make ours a real "Home" (not an institution), and it is the first and only home worthy of the name, that many of our girls have known. And, to provide for the physical comfort, the social training and education of these who have been gathered from all walks in life, and have never been amenable to proper discipline is no small task. It requires much labor, tact, devotion, patience and charity on the part of the household officers to restrain, correct and encourage, as the case may be.

Jane Adams has well said: "Afford in all possible ways amusements that are helpful." The natural love for play has caused much trouble. It is impossible to accomplish permanent good without sufficient recreation, for, "All work and no play, makes Jack a dull boy."

Through the generosity of our friends we have been able to afford our girls several very pleasant little "outings" this year; such as, a train-ride and picnic on the 4th of July, free admittance to our County Fair, tickets for a matinee, etc.

Our large lawn and garden affords fine facilities for out-door exercise and recreation. But, it is also true, that "all play and no work, makes Jack a bad boy," so we see that our girls have plenty to do; and with our lessons in school, and all the work pertaining to a well-kept home, cooking, mending and washing for a family of our size keeps the girls busy and happy the week through. Sunday being the busiest of all. The work all finished and the girls ready for Sunday School by 9.30 o'clock. After Sunday School they remain for morning church service, every member of the family goes to church, after which they return home for dinner, and then they attend "Junior League" in the afternoon. The day is never too long.

The health of the girls has always been remarkably good and still continues so.

Our girls become very much attached to the Home and to one another. Always sorry to leave and glad to return.

During the last year we have had under our care forty girls and a number of applications had to be refused for the lack of room. We expect by another year, however, to enlarge our building by the addition of a new wing.

Owing to the prevailing high prices of provisions, our household expenses have run a little higher than usual. We have received during the year $2,266.30. We have paid out for provisions, teacher's and matron's salary, light and heat and incidentals, or a total expense of $2,176.82. This is the investment or outlay in money for work, time, strength, etc. The results are known only to Him who has said: "Inasmuch as you did it unto one of the least of these, ye did it unto Me."

Mr. Colborn:—We have one here his morning that you will be pleased to hear from. He was a professor in Juniata College, but for some years has been devoting most of his time to child work. He is connected with the Russell Sage Foundation. I take pleasure in introducing Prof. Emmert, of Huntingdon.

Professor Emmert:

I am not entirely new in the work for children. My experience covers a period of twenty-eight years. For many years I have been impressed that the most important consideration for the children we would establish in families, is their careful supervision. Several years ago I gave up the class room to develop that idea. I made up my mind that we will do little more placing out of children until we can take proper care of them. No one can lie down to sleep with a good conscience or die in peace with helpless children, for whose guardianship he is responsible, scattered over the country, unless their supervision is assured.

In an address before a joint meeting of the Christian Associations of Juniata College, I once referred to the fact that there were at that time in India or on the way nine missionaries from that institution. I expressed the hope that I might live to see the day when there should be a fund of $25,000 to sustain an active agent or missionary to children in the Juniata Valley.

After that meeting two young ladies followed me to my house. One handed me a penny saying, "This is all I have just now." Another gave me twenty-five cents. "This is the beginning of the fund—'the mustard seed,'" I remarked. Later a young man hearing of this incident added three dollars. The fund remained $3.26 for several years. I then wrote a little booklet, "After twenty-four Years." "A Plea for the poor children in the Juniata Valley. This little booklet fell into the hands of a gentleman, who on his way to New York sent for me to meet him at the train. He said, "I read the booklet. I see what you have in mind, and I approve your plan. Can you get the money?" I told him I had $400 in pledges and some other promised. He said, "When you have $24,000 I will give you the twenty-fifth." The same day another gentleman offered $1,000 and another $500. At this time the fund has reached $14,000 with numerous promises of help later on. The last $1,000 came from Mr. Carnegie, but I must get $24 for every one he gives, while for a church organ you may get dollar for dollar. I am encouraged in that he and other men of wealth recognize this movement.

We mean to charter this fund and keep it sacred for the purpose of supervision. It is not intended for food and clothing, these we can get for the asking any time, but it is an investment for brains. To do this work effectively we must have the services of competent people. We cannot depend upon volunteer service and our work of placing children in families will never be a success until in each county or group of counties supervision is guaranteed.

I have been doing some work for the Russell Sage Foundation in the study of "child-placing." We are finding some important facts. The trustees of the fund are not giving money away at this time. Job said, "I was eyes to the blind, feet to the lame, a father to the fatherless, and the cause which I knew not, that I searched out." They are searching out the cause, and when the work is done, we will have some facts of great value to all who are interested in poor children.

A study is being made of child-placing in the United States by the Sage Commission. Dr. Hasting H. Hart is chairman of the Committee. He will be here to-night on his return from the Pacific coast and will discuss the matter fully, I hope, under the subject, "After Supervision."

President Smith:—We have with us Mr. Charles H. Pennypacker, an attorney of our Bar, who is also an historian, who will give us a ten-minute talk on the history of Chester County.

Mr. Pennypacker was received with applause, and said:

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen:

I have been talking in this Court Room for almost forty years and if my voice does not fill it on this occasion raise your right hand and you will get a tone an octave higher.

This county was named in 1682 when William Penn landed where the City of Chester is now located in Delaware county. By his side stood Caleb Pusey. Penn said to Pusey "What shall we call this goodly land?" and Caleb replied, "We will call it Chester after the town on the River Dee in England from whence we came."

We are the original county in this State and we continue to be the original county because our people are original people. We not only study the ways and methods of caring for children here, but we study the ways and methods of the parents of those children and we know our one hundred thousand people as well as we know our next door neighbors, and, my friends, we are here to care for the children and look out for the parents.

This county was patriotic in the days of the Revolution. It represented five streaks of emigration from across the Atlantic. There were the Swedes, the Dutch, the Society of Friends, of which the speaker is a member, the Presbyterians, the Methodists and the Catholics.

In the summer of 1777 Brandywine Manor Presbyterian Church in this county had sent every able-bodied man from its membership into the Continental Army, and the women of that parish went to the harvest field and took in the harvest. Such was the patriotism of the followers of John Calvin (Applause).

But what shall I say of the descendants of old Ireland, who came to Chester county? One of them, General Anthony Wayne, commanded the left wing of the patriot army at the battle of Brandywine, and General John Sullivan, an Irishman from Londonderry, New Hampshire, commanded the right wing on that same battlefield. As early as 1790 committees in many parts of Chester county established school houses, employed teachers and furthered in every way the interests of education, and in 1834, when Thaddeus Stevens urged the adoption of a common school system by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, our representatives were the staunchest friends of the measure.

We gave to the war of the Rebellion more than three thousand of our sons, willing, anxious and determined to preserve this Union. And this county has been noted for the ability of her sons, for the willingness and eagerness of her people to face responsibility, to look for the best and to use the best, to welcome reform, new thoughts and new ideas upon every occasion.

My friends, look over these seven hundred and twenty square miles and tell me where you can find a more prosperous and fertile land and a more worthy community than this. Our sons and our daughters have scattered all over the West, and go where you may in the western counties of Pennsylvania you will find the descendants of Chester county ancestors.

Our waters are tributary to the Susquehanna on the one hand and to the Delaware on the other. In West Chester we are four hundred and thirty feet nearer heaven than they are in Philadelphia (Laughter). We have a population of almost eleven thousand people and in the early days of anti-slavery it was a very active station upon the "Underground Railroad."

Your worthy Chairman informed you at the beginning that I was limited to ten minutes, though I suppose he meant that I was limited at ten minutes, and I must stop. We are the only consistent Prohibition county in southeastern Pennsylvania. It matters not whether it be a Republican or a Democrat he always has the reserved right to vote for Prohibition.

"The rose may stand for England, the lily for France uphold;
The thistle bloom for Scotland and the shamrock for Ireland bold;
But the greatest and the finest of all the great bequests
Is the shimmering sheen of the ripening corn,
The glory of the West."

Mr. Walter Bowditch here led the discussion on "Intemperance and Pauperism," and addressed the convention as follows:

It is certainly a pleasure to visit this beautiful place at this our thirty-fourth annual convention and to meet so many familiar faces. The committee have me on the program for a discussion on "Intemperance and Pauperism." This is an honor I appreciate. I am not a public speaker, but will make a few plain remarks, the position we occupy as Directors of the Poor bring us in contact with all kinds of vice and poverty, the most serious question, is intemperance, as the most cases we assist can be traced to that cause. How to prevent it is beyond me. We are constantly called on from families where the parents squander their money. We know it at the time but cannot let children suffer. We sometimes by kind treatment and a little attention induce them to reform. Sometimes we try harsh measures which does not remedy the evil. If they are sent to the correction or the jail as they deserve we still have their families to support and when they come out, as a rule, they are as bad as ever. This question of lessening this evil is one that has occupied the thoughts of the profoundest thinkers from time immemorial. What we men and women who are engaged in looking after those who are in many cases the innocent victims of intemperance have to face and contend with, is not so much a matter of cure as it is a preventive. Men of practical experience know full well that the cause of pauperism is not always the intemperate use of alcoholic beverages. There are many other causes that lead to the disruption of a home other than the evil of drink. The evil of unwarranted jealousy and the evil of the gossipping neighbor are only a few of the causes that lead to pauperism other than the drink habit. There is intemperance in all things, and the man of practical affairs sees and meets them in his every-day walk in life, and the question that confronts him is not one that appeals to brute force or to the corrective forces of those who administer our laws. No, to the practical man of affairs, the idea of moral suasion is and must always be predominant. When you meet a man or a woman (and it must be admitted that it is not always the man who is the victim of excesses) do not attempt to club him into bettering his ways, but speak to him kindly, pat him on the back and whisper an encouraging word into his ear. Were more of this sort of attempted reformation put into force on the part of we men and women who come into contact with not exactly the seamy, degraded side of life, but the purely unfortunate, the result, as I have already said, of intemperance in thought, speech or action and there would be an appreciable decrease in the number of orphans and destitute children, unhappy wives and miserable, discouraged and down and out husbands.

I thank you for your attention. Last night one of the speakers said he didn't care so much for the individual as for the whole body. I am talking for the individual and for the whole body. I am not honored as a Director of the Poor, but I am in many other charities. I am not a talker. I do the best I can for charitable work, and the question here is charity.

Applause.

Mr. H. H. Baumgartner (Venango), here addressed the Convention, as follows:

The subject assigned me for discussion is as broad as the universe and beyond the capabilities of any human brain to comprehend the magnitude and importance of the issue. It is a fact to be deplored, however, that in this great land of ours we have so great a percentage of inebriates and paupers. However great are our institutions for the care of our unfortunate brethren, they are taxed to their utmost capacity, and under our system of government there is no other nation under the golden canopy of heaven who has made such efforts to reclaim that portion of our populace, who have not the moral force to resist the power of appetite, but in this great and glorious nation of success and achievement our statesmen and financiers have deemed it wise to separate or divide our acreage and populace into States, counties and townships, that we may better administer the affairs of State and Nation. The great central qualification of success, we believe, is organization and in no State has the efforts of the organized bodies been so successful as in this grand old Commonwealth of Pennsylvania; and calling to mind the nobler efforts and excellent results achieved in the past, we feel assured that this thirty-fourth annual convention of Poor Directors and Public Charities will mark an epoch in the history of this organization; good that will receive plaudits of like organizations in sister States and under the comprehensive influence of this organization and particularly that branch of it known as the Children's Aid Society, the influence for the suppression of intemperance and ultimate pauperism by removing children from homes where intemperance and low aspiration prevail, and placing them in homes where they are surrounded by restraining influences and high aspirations has been a service inspired from on high, and one which we as Poor Directors should not fail to recognize in a substantial manner. The solution of this question is problematical in its nature, and I have no doubt there are as many opinions as to its solution as there are people present this morning, however, I do not recognize this subject as entirely a political problem, neither do I deem it exclusively a social question, but I am inclined to regard it as more social than otherwise. In my opinion we are living too far apart in the home life. We do not get together close enough to instill in our children the importance of a clean life and a high and noble ambition, not that we are any the less interested in our sons and daughters than our fathers and mothers, but the exigencies of the age claim so much of our time that the home life in a great many instances is neglected. Friends, how well do you remember when that dear old sainted father or mother took you on their knee or called the little family together and impressed on their minds or instilled in their hearts the importance of a clean life and a high and noble ambition. Those lessons, friends, have followed you from your childhood to the days of maturity even unto the present day. You had instilled into your mind the importance of good, honest work. Have you ever stood at the gate of one of our great manufacturing industries, where hundreds of men are employed, have you ever looked into the faces of these men who are driving the wheels of commerce to a degree never attained before in the history of this nation the men, strong of body and mind, and clean of heart are not the men who become paupers or inebriates. A few days ago in the City of Hartford, where is located one of the largest carpet mills in this country, if not in the world, where thirty-two hundred men are employed, stood one young man, frail of body but strong of heart who took his place in the line of big-hearted, noble workmen, not in the counting room, not in the office, but in the sorting room, sorting wool for $5.00 per week. This young man is learning his life-work that he may be better fitted to occupy the position that may come to him later in life. This young man is of the foremost family of our country, the eldest son of the President of the United States (Applause). When a man like Theodore Roosevelt appreciates the value of good, honest and earnest work, that his sons may develop into able-bodied men, clean of heart and strong of limb how much more should we, as an organization, take upon ourselves the responsibility of instilling into the hearts of the rising generation the ambition to work.

I wish to say in conclusion that the debt of gratitude that these Directors of the Poor owe to the Children's Aid Society is one that we may, at times, underrate. But the founders of this organization (many of them gone to their reward) could they have looked with prophetic eye adown the path of time until the present day, their wildest ambitions would have been more than realized, and those old patriarchs who have lived and died in the work, should be an incentive to us.

Let me admonish you, be honest, be earnest, be zealous, until the smoke is rolled back and we see shining over the golden ramparts of heaven the faces of those old patriarchs, and we hear the hallelujahs ringing from their throats and the good words "well done." I thank you.

Applause.

Samuel T. Bell (Mercer):

This question of intemperance and poverty is an important one. I have seen a great deal of it in my life, and I have seen both sides. I was brought up under the most rigid Scotch Covenanter principles, and have therefore had good reason to abstain; but in the war it was a very poor school for that kind of education. Brought up as rigidly as I was I might have been liable to have been led away, when I went out for myself, but I know of its effects. I know that it degenerates. We hear a great deal about the environment we live in. We think if we are brought up in the proper society we can overcome this matter. We can mitigate it to a greater or less degree, by efforts towards suppressing it and teaching the young to know that it is a thing to be loathed.

The Ladies' Aid Society is doing a great work, and if we can give them the power and authority to reach the child and instill this idea into them we will do more good than in any other way. Our school teachers and educators can do much good in this line, more perhaps than anyone else. And we can, as citizens, help to set an example before the youth of the land that will help in this work. I thank you for your attention to my short talk.

Applause.

Mrs. Jane T. Barnard, of Kennett Square, read the following paper, "Result of 24 years work of C. A. S. in Chester County," from the program of yesterday, which was received with applause:

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen:

The committee who prepared the program for this convention has asked me to report "the result of twenty-four years work of the Children's Aid Society of Chester County." In order to do this, it is necessary to go back to the time when the law was passed, requiring that all children between the ages of two and sixteen years should be removed from the almshouse. This law aroused an interest and an enthusiasm in the minds of many earnest men and women in the county and meetings were called to consider the best means of complying with it.

For a time it was a mooted question whether it should be another institution especially for children, or placing them in private homes. Finally good judgment prevailed and the latter plan was adopted, and we have yet to hear of any dissatisfaction either with the members of the Aid Society or the Directors of the Poor, who have always encouraged us by their hearty co-operation and advice, and their appreciation of our services. At the beginning the field was new, many of our ideas were crude and our plans imperfect. Step by step we have learned by experience and trial; little by little we have established a system which is working easily, harmoniously and beneficiently.

We have an active membership of two hundred and six women; 10 life members, and nine contributing members. Since 1884 we have found homes for 498 children, while our supplementary department (the children not charged to the county) numbers 154.

We began by providing only for those children subject to the jurisdiction of the Directors of the Poor and afterwards developed our plans to cover a much wider scope and embrace the protection of all homeless, deserted and maltreated children. Without desiring to relieve from responsibility those to whom the proper care of these children naturally belongs, we observed many cases where parents so neglected or abused their offspring that it was deemed necessary if not incumbent upon us in the interest of humanity to interfere and separate them in order that these children might be placed where they could be trained to habits of order, decency, and usefulness in the community; but when parents, being hard pressed by overwork and poverty, were disposed to drop the burden of caring for their children, these have been encouraged and helped to keep their family together. From our experience in this line of our work, we have come to regard it as the most important—the work of prevention. That by timely advice and help we may prevent the necessity for the child being taken to the County Home, the memory of which, to the sensitive child, always brings its sting. Some one has aptly said, "To cure is the voice of the past; to prevent the divine whisper of to-day."

On September 14, 1891, we became a chartered society with added authority to arrest persons guilty of cruelty to children. We have not always found it easy to fit the child to the home and the home to the child. It has quite frequently been our experience that a boy or girl has been returned to us with very discouraging reports regarding character, when placed in another home the bad traits have disappeared and the child has done well. When the older boy or girl has shown a particular disposition for study or trade, special provision has been made for the former in industrial schools and for the latter in situations suited for their ability. Such instances are likely to be rare in the class of children with whom we have to deal. We are careful that no innocent little child shall be put in a home with another whose tendencies make it an undesirable companion. This is one of the dangers which best institutional life or any form of benevolence that crowds all classes of children under one roof. Our trouble has been with the boy when he has entered his teens. "The child is father of the man," says Wordsworth, and the lad of thirteen and older becomes restless and ambitious to earn wages as others around him are doing. The manly instinct within him urges him to become a possessor of money and things he may call his own. Ignorant and undisciplined, he resolves to break away from his moorings, take matters into his own hands and starts out to shift for himself. Sometimes after hard experience he returns penitent to his adopted home, but more often drifts into the life of a vagrant. Our society tries to anticipate this whim of the boy by paying small wages and so conserve these valuable forces and turn them into channels of usefulness. We do not lose interest in our wards after they have reached their majorities and gone out from our fold to make a living for themselves, some of whom still look to us for advice and aid. We are proud to point to a number who were babies when they came to us who have now families of their own, and are respected in the communities where they live.

A visiting committee is always on duty to see the children in their homes—to examine their school reports, to make sure they are getting the required amount of schooling and to look after their general welfare. Ever since our work began we have felt the want of a clearing house where the children who are not in a condition to place in private homes might remain long enough to be inspected, their peculiarities noted, so that a more intelligent discretion might be observed in placing them.

The greatest menace to our progress is the saloon. As we come in contact with these children in their homes, we cannot ignore the fact that to this source, and to it almost exclusively, is to be traced our wretched homes and abandoned children. So long as the law legalizes and protects a business that creates pauperism, that fills our almshouses, insane asylums and homes for the feeble-minded; that is responsible, as statistics show, for ninety per cent. of all crime; so long as this continues, there will come as a sure result these poor little dwarfed people—dwarfed in soul and body, crying for help, and which makes necessary the various organizations for their rescue. Our Society is careful not to place a child where any inmate of the home is known to be of intemperate habits, or where the moral atmosphere is in any way doubtful. An able writer has said, "When the bridge over which we must all travel has a gaping hole in the centre through which travelers continually drop into the flood beneath, we should not content ourselves with organizing a small life-boat to pick up now and then a drowning wretch, nor in building hospitals at the wayside to receive and restore the poor wretched victims. We must mend the hole in the bridge."

So long as we have faith in the All-Father and human nature we cannot help but work towards a better condition of things. Our only hope and relief must be found in wiser methods of education, and education where such children are fitted for the practical duties of life, better homes and purer politics.

In rounding up almost a quarter of a century, the Chester County Children's Aid Society has reason to feel encouraged; that under many adverse circumstances we have rescued from further contamination these county wards and placed them in a purer atmosphere and on a higher plane of life, where they are subjected to good influences and their future welfare assured. That we have according to our best wisdom brightened the existence and sweetened the lives of these little defenceless beings who have well nigh been robbed of their birthright in this beautiful world through the lives and shortcomings of their parents.

"He built a house, time laid it in the dust;
He wrote a book, its title now forgot;
He ruled a city, but his name is not
On any tablet graven, or where rust
Can gather from disuse or marble bust.
He took a child from out a wretched cot,
Who on the State dishonor might have brought,
And reared him to the Christian's hope and trust.
The boy to manhood grown became a light
To many souls, preached for human need
The wondrous love of the Omnipotent.
The work has multiplied like stars at night
When darkness deepens. Every noble deed
Lasts longer than a granite monument."

President Smith:—We have one here who is known for the splendid work he has done in bringing our Normal School to its present standard. I introduce Dr. Philips.

Dr. Philips was received with applause, and addressed the Convention as follows:

I asked your President if I might call attention to something that I think is of importance to your work. Perhaps you all know that the last Legislature provided for a State Educational Commission, and the Governor appointed that commission, and seven men are now at work codifying and suggesting revisions to the School laws of the State. They are trying to write a new Code, which shall be the best, we think, that we can have passed by the Legislature.

We have been holding meetings in different parts of the State and asking for suggestions from those engaged in school work and others, and we have found the suggestion coming to us that it sometimes happens that children cannot attend school because of their poverty; that they haven't sufficient clothing to attend school and sometimes on account of lack of, or insufficient food. These are live questions, and I ask you whether you have any suggestions to the Commission.

As a member of the Commission and its Secretary, I would like any suggestions you may have to make. It occurs to me that if there is need in this direction it ought to be attended to by you. If there is need of such help we ought not to put into the hands of School Boards the power to help those children, in this respect, because that multiplies agencies and divides responsibilities, and it seems to me that if anything of this kind needs to be done it should be referred to the Directors or Overseers of the Poor, for investigation, and remedied.

I would like this body to decide, first, is there need to do anything? Do you want legislation on the subject, or have we enough now? Second, if you need some legislation would it be wise to have some suggestions made by you, in the line of legislation, which would provide that in cases of such need the matter should be reported to the Directors or Overseers of the Poor and that it should be their duty to attend to it?

I would be glad if this Association would take that matter up, perhaps by the appointment of a small committee, and report at a later meeting of the Commission. I would be glad to take to the Commission a report from this body, on these subjects and whatever you may suggest will have great weight with the Commission. This is the time to secure these laws if we need them.

Applause.

President Smith:—We will refer the matter to the Legislative Committee, with the request that they meet with you and discuss the matter.

Mr. D. A. Mackin, Superintendent of "Home Retreat," here read the following paper, which was received with applause:

THE SUBJECTIVE SIDE OF ALMSHOUSE LIFE.

From a sociological viewpoint it is within the range of certainty that no subject has been so many-sidedly discussed as the care of the poor and the infirm. But if all the numerous papers read before convened Associations of Directors of the Poor, and if all the magazine and newspaper articles relating to this theme were spread out before us now, we would likely find that the subject was treated almost exclusively from an objective standpoint, resulting either from observation, or from impression or as a sequence of periodic conferences.

It is a recognized fact that the care of the poor is contrastively improved on the method followed even as close as ten years ago. No one admits this more readily than managers of almshouses and Directors of the Poor. It might almost be ventured that the improvement is one of kind and not of degree; for the system has been entirely reconstructed if not virtually re-formed and of these improved conditions the indigent and the infirm have been the exclusive if at times the unappreciative beneficiaries.

But as "onward," "upward" and "excelsior" are the shibboleths of the day, it may be opportune to view almshouse life not from the stereotyped distant height of social supremacy, but from the subjective standpoint of equality. In so far as our real position in life permits, to feel as the inmate feels, to think as he thinks, to experience his transient joys and his deepening sorrows—in a word, to reincarnate ourselves and view condition not as a manager or as an overseer, but as an inmate.

By "inmate" it is not to be inferred that class which may be called "irreclaimables." They who do not and will not endeavor to help themselves receive but little co-operative sympathy from laymen, and managers of almshouses may pardonably feel justified in being indifferent to the social elevation of such. The scope of this paper has to do with those only who have that little seed of self-respect embedded deep down somewhere in the fastnesses of their being even though adversity has retarded or stunted its growth. Our interest centers in the victim of uncontrolled circumstances and not in the self-constituted drone of society. The one naturally mellows the "human" in us while the other tends to harden if not to convince us of the futility of any uplifting endeavors.

And when managers and Directors of the Poor look back over their official years and shape their impressions into one tangible, composite whole, they view a picture as distinctively real in its component parts as it is kaleidoscopic in its variety. The inmate is as really present, as an individual, in the constituent part as he is truly present, as an aggregate, in the composite and it is from his place in the picture or from the subjective side that we shall now treat almshouse life. The subject may be divided into three parts: First, the inmate as he sees himself; second, as he sees the manager; third, as he sees his fellows.

An inmate may be poor in other ways than financial. He may be poor in body, in spirit, in mind, in morality, or in the unwholesomeness of previous social environment. He may be afflicted in this manner either singly or collectively. On the other hand, he may be richly endowed in temperament, in disposition, in character or in handicraft aptitude, also either singly or collectively. There is something in his make-up that he himself is unable to analyze. He has a longing, an aching, a yearning for something that, under existing conditions, appears unattainable, and yet in a blurred, vague, undefined way, he feels that things will ultimately be bettered and that, in the end, "the sun will shine some day."

When he contrasts his present with the fateful "what might have been" it is not expected of him to over-indulge in expressions of jubilation. There are times when he is sorely perplexed. He knows it is morally impossible for a manager to give his undivided attention to bettering his condition or to concentrate all his efforts on his individual requirements; yet, somehow, he yearns for just such aid but feels a delicacy in taking the initiative.

He faces the stubborn facts of his present and gropingly wonders, "Will, if so, when will this present end?" If not a graduate of the "Institutional Habit" class, he recoils from having his friends or relatives apprised of his whereabouts, and is in constant dread of that whereabouts becoming known. He develops sensitiveness or rather that quality grows on him to such an unusual degree of intensity as to render it difficult at times to distinguish it from a deeply formed habit of suspecting or mistrusting the motives or actions of his fellows or superiors.

This condition of mind is often responsible for conduct frequently erroneously accounted for. His cynicism or grouchiness may be based on the consciousness of his present indefiniteness rather than on any inherent tendency to unjust criticism.

His mental faculties are not altogether dormant nor altogether alert. Many of them grow indolent through lack of action. That unseen and undeveloped little seed of self-respect above referred to impels him to look to some one in whom his confidences can repose. But his battle-scarred experience with the world makes him extremely cautious. He is chary in confiding in his fellows either because he thinks "they have troubles enough of their own" or because he recognizes in their condition a like powerlessness to aid him. He is timid in approaching the manager for reasons not so clearly defined and thus he settles into a mental state closely akin to aimlessness in life. Mental emergencies arise which he is unable to meet and herein lurks a danger, which, for his sake, should be guarded against.

Second, the manager of an institution, in the discharge of his duties, should not cater to the approval nor should he fear the disapproval of either superior or subject. His motive should be higher, loftier, nobler. He knows that it is one of the most beautiful compensations in life that when a man really helps another he, at the same time helps himself. He knows that in almshouse management as well as in other walks of life, the "marble heart" is more in evidence than the "glad hand." He knows that the mantle of charity and much less that of mercy is seldom thrown over his shortcomings. He knows that misrepresentation of his administration, whether groundless or not, is one of the penalties of his appointment. Yet, he seldom adverts to the fact that this also is the picture drawn of him by the inmate. He looks upon his manager as one whose private as well as his official life should be exemplary.

He looks upon him as counsellor, provider, monitor, attorney, secretary, protector, banker, detective, restorer of stolen property, either real or imaginary, surgeon in chief in the first aid to the injured corps, expert in physics and metaphysics, an adviser in all things temporal and spiritual, an adept in all known or knowable accomplishments—in fact, the very spirit and genius of the institution carrying around with him a monumental block of encyclopedias—walking and otherwise.

The inmate expects much of the manager, and for that very reason he is slow in forming an adverse judgment on any given act of his superior. The average manager has many friends among the inmates not because he is manager so much as because he is a man.

Third, among his fellows, he finds a bewildering mixture of manly and shady traits of character. In one, he finds that honor is by no means a forgettable or an unknown quantity; he sees another whose only claim to consistency is his inconsistency. In some he notes the expression indicative of that hope that "springs eternal in the human breast;" in others, the expression, "Leave hope behind, ye that enter here." In one, he perceives the bruised blossom of surfeited credulity; in another, is traced the "sere and yellow leaf" of a wrecked and broken life. In one, he regards the blustering swagger of the bully; in another, the cringing demeanor of the hypocrite. In one, he observes the ragged outlines of the fading rainbow; in another, the blackness of the looming tempest. In one he feels the airiness of twilight; in another, the oppressiveness of midnight's gloom. In one, he views the struggle of principle; in another, the supineness of defeat.

The inmate finds it difficult to harmonize with this hetrogeneous mass nor can he entertain the possibility of any successful effort in blending such widely discordant characters. In almshouse life as he views it, he subscribes to the soundness of the adage, "Variety is the spice of life." For here is variety in plenty where the spice is by no means whole in form, but bruised and crushed and pounded to the ground by the ruthless pestle of experience in the granite-sided mortar of life.

When he beholds this Babel of trait-conglomerateness, he readily admits it is easier to criticize than to correct and harder to reform than to deform. He hesitates to believe that it is easier to do right than to do wrong, for he sees innocent victims of brutishness walled in by the stern reality of almshouse life while the gloating roues and deserting fathers revel in the sweet-laden atmosphere of liberty.

Such are some of the thoughts impressed upon the mind of the inmate as he views the ever-varying phases of almshouse life and when he delves into the recesses of cause and effect, he cannot help but conclude with the poet:

> Honor and shame from no condition rise,
> Act well your part—there all the honor lies.

Mr. Fred S. Hall, of Philadelphia, here read the following paper on "Child Labor," which was received with applause:

OUR ANTIQUATED CHILD LABOR LAW.

Pennsylvania is the greatest manufacturing State in the country—so the United States Census Office reports. From that office we learn also that Pennsylvania has over two million children of "school age"—more than are found in all the New England States, Delaware and Maryland combined. Furthermore, Pennsylvania has the very industries in which child labor may be most profitably employed. Cotton goods, hosiery, silk, worsted, glass, cigars, boots and shoes, woolen goods, men's clothing and canning—these are the great child-using industries in the United States, named in the order of their importance. Pennsylvania leads all other States in the glass industry, while in hosiery, silk, cigars and woolen goods, it stands next to the top.

No other State in the country, except New York, has so many children to offer to industry, and no other State so many and so great child-using industries to tempt the child. Nowhere is there greater need for strict child labor laws, and in no other important manufacturing State outside of the South are the child labor laws more lax.

Two years ago we had a chance to enact a law such as protects the children of our neighboring States. Some of us worked and wrote letters in behalf of the bill which was backed by the Child Labor Committee and the Women's Clubs. Many of us, however, did not, and the powerful opposition defeated our bill. The same forces to-day are sending their emissaries from county to county among those who voted for our bill, and have been re-elected in an effort to swing such men into the ranks of our enemies. Nothing short of the most active, continued agitation possible, by the friends of the children, can pass our bills at the coming session.

According to our present law children become fourteen years old whenever their fathers or mothers wish to swear that they are fourteen. In nineteen States, including every one of the large manufacturing States, it has been learned that the parents of our would-be child workers, especially the foreign parents, can not be trusted to tell the truth about their children's ages when a false oath will bring them $3.00 or $3.50 a week from the wages of the child, and the parent's affidavit has, therefore been set aside. Pennsylvania, however, still naively assumes that such parents will tell the truth if they merely have to swear to it.

As a result, our State has on the one hand been held up to the scorn of other States because of its child labor conditions, while on the other hand, factory inspectors and mine inspectors have denied that such conditions exist, alleging that for every child employed there is a "certificate" of age on file, and so for years the controversy has dragged its weary length along.

The valuelessness of a "certificate," which is only a parent's affidavit, is well known among school men. They see children taken out of their schools one, two and three years under the legal age, but are powerless to stop it, the parent's affidavit being supreme as proof of age.

One of these superintendents of schools, Mr. M. W. Cummings, of Olyphant, took pains a few months ago to establish by records the various ages of seventy-eight working children whom he suspected to be under fourteen years of age. Their ages were found to be as follows:

Ten were 10 years old.
Twenty were 11 years old.
Thirty-six were 12 years old.
Twelve were 13 years old.

Every one of these children had affidavits declaring them to be fourteen years old. Most of them were boys employed in coal breakers. The others were factory children.

To realize all this means one should remember that Olyphant has only 1127 children all told in its public schools. The true significance of the above figures is, therefore, best brought out by a comparison between the children ten to thirteen years of age who were in school in Olyphant, and the children of those ages who were at work on false affidavits.

There were 185 ten year old children in the town, rich and poor together, and ten of these were at work; 180 eleven-year old children and twenty of these were at work. Of the 170 twelve-year old children in the town 36, or more than one-fifth, were at work because of this evil law that makes false affidavits possible.

Mr. E. E. Miller, Superintendent of Schools in Bradford, at the opposite end of the State, in his address in 1908, as President of the State School Superintendents' Association, spoke as follows in regard to conditions as he knows them:

"All that was required from the employers of child labor was an affidavit before some alderman or notary. Of course, such evidence was in many instances no evidence at all. Under these conditions Pennsylvania was given a very unsavory and undesirable reputation, in regard to the children employed in her mines, mills and factories. The State has been indicted for maintaining a condition that is a disgrace to civilization. I am aware that the Chief Factory Inspector has protested against this indictment as being undeserved; but the experience of most school men during the year in which they had something to do with the enforcement of the law tended to establish in their minds the truthfulness of the charges made."

From Philadelphia we have testimony of the same sort. Mr. Wm. Thornton, Superintendent of the Bureau of Compulsory Education writes:

"The affidavit, which is now the only requisite to obtain an employment certificate, is of absolutely no value."

In 1905 Pennsylvania had a good law—one which required some trustworthy proof of age, before a child might work. This law was declared unconstitutional in 1906 because of one of the forms of proof which it required, and the parent's affidavit came again into force as proof of age. As a result, the number of certificates issued in Philadelphia increased by leaps and bounds.

We quote again from Mr. Thornton:

"From June 1 to December 31, 1905, 4,953 employment certificates, were issued, for which were furnished some kind of corroborative evidence of birth, and during the same months of 1906, 8.783 employment certificates were issued. No better evidence than this is needed to prove that it is absolutely necessary to have positive proof of a child's age in order to determine whether he has the legal right under the law to be employed or to be denied employment."

So universal is this testimony, that it would be unnecessary to accumulate it, if it were not for the amazing claim made by the Chief Factory Inspector, John C. Delaney, that "there may be some parents who will commit perjury, but the number is comparatively few." The man who expresses this opinion is also, it will be remembered, the same one who asks in his report: "Why should boys and girls fourteen years of age, and in good physical condition be withheld from learning a useful trade or from earning a necessary livelihood simply because they cannot read and write?" and then adds: "Though I am a warm champion of school education, I fail to see the connection between the three R's and the necessity for seeking employment and the ability to do the work."

It is probable that most of us are not willing to be influenced very much by the opinion of such a man, at least in matters relating to child labor.

Our child labor law is antiquated also in the method it provides by which these employment affidavits are granted. It is bad enough to have the parent's affidavit as the only proof of age, but it is worse to provide, as our law does—that any notary, magistrate, alderman or justice of the peace (and there are nearly 10,000 of them in Pennsylvania) may issue these affidavits.

How impossible it is to supervise the important work which these persons perform is indicated in a letter from Chief Factory Inspector J. C. Delaney, under date of May 23, 1908, in which he says: "It were physically impossible for this department to mail a notice of any kind to all persons of the Commonwealth who are authorized to administer oaths. In the first place, we have no mailing list of such persons, and again, we have neither clerical force adequate to the task nor a contingent fund that can stand the tax."

On one occasion when it was necessary to notify those who might take affidavits in regard to the proper procedure, it was necessary to adopt the following round about and unsatisfactory method: A circular was sent to the 39 Factory Inspectors throughout the State, giving them the information for transmission to the magistrates, notaries, aldermen, justices of the peace, etc., with the following instructions: "You will use all possible diligence in spreading the information contained in this order among officers authorized to attest affidavits. It would be well also to acquaint the local press in your respectice districts with the same, requesting its publication."

It is small wonder, therefore, that these nine thousand odd men and women are ignorant of their duty in this important matter and that their work is wretchedly done. And yet listen to the Chief Factory Inspector's defence of this discredited system.

In his report for 1906, referring to the bill he had drafted for the 1907 session of the Legislature, he said: "By this measure the authority to issue employment certificates is vested solely in magistrates, aldermen and justices of the peace. This latter provision has been attacked by those who assume without proof that magistrates, aldermen and justices of the peace would be derelict in their duties. There is not any evidence that these men would not perform their duties properly."

As against this, we place the Chief Factory Inspector's own testimony in an earlier report, as follows:

"The worst class of offenders were men to whom was granted a right to sit in judgment upon other offenders and to administer law and justice. The employer may be ignorant of the law or may have a child in his employ illegally but unknowingly; the parents may, by poverty, feel compelled to obtain employment certificate for a child in an illegal way; but a magistrate who issues an employment certificate to a child in violation of law and in violation of the printed warning upon the employment certificate, is a fit subject for prosecution and penalty. For issuing employment certificates in violation of law, to children, fourteen aldermen, fourteen notaries public, two justices of the peace and one mayor of a city were proceeded against. Seven of the aldermen were freed from the penalty of a fine and costs by a technicality based upon the wording of the statute, and the others paid fines ranging in amount from five to fifty dollars together with the incidental costs."

We cannot help asking if this, from his own report, is not proof to the Chief Factory Inspector that these men do not perform their duties properly; or, listen again to Mr. Delaney's chief statistician on the same subject:

"Claiming a legal right to witness to any kind of an affidavit, notaries and aldermen, not a few, placed in the hands of illiterate children the affidavits which, used as employment certificates, admitted them to places in the factory. Some of these official miscreants were convicted of their crimes and fined as they deserved to be. The deputies found 408 of their young and ignorant victims and released them from labor bondage and put them in the way of the school house, that they might become intelligent citizens."

Common sense dictates the remedy for such a condition, even if our neighboring States had not already put it into practice. School officials should have the right to sign the paper which starts a child on its life to work. Children must stay in school by the school law, until they are fourteen, and it is both simple and logical and right that the school superintendents should grant them their certificates for work. Nearly half the States in the country, including practically all the great manufacturing States, have adopted this system and it works well.

The school men of the State, although they realize the additional work which it will place upon them, are almost unanimous in favor of the change. Chief Factory Inspector Delaney appeared before these men at their convention two years ago and told them that it was wrong to place the burden of issuing certificates upon them, "the most intelligent, the hardest worked and poorest paid class of toilers," and yet that convention proceeded at once to adopt the following resolution:

"Resolved, That all certificates of employment should be issued under the direction of the school authorities of the district in which the child resides."

The States which will allow notaries, etc., to issue employment certificates are the following:

North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, Tennessee, West Virginia, Idaho and also, to their shame, Indiana, Michigan and Pennsylvania.

Is it not about time that Pennsylvania should move up and out of this class?

Our law is antiquated in the third place, because it allows children to work twelve hours a day. The noon hour is not counted in the ho rs of work, so the Pennsylvania laws allows a fourteen-year old girl to begin work at six in the morning and not leave the mill until seven at night. This is not allowed regularly. The law requires that work for a whole week shall not average more than ten hours a day. It works out as follows wherever the ten-hour limit is exceeded: The children work regularly ten hours and a half or ten hours and three-quarters a day, and have a short day on Saturday.

Consider for a moment what even a ten-hour day means. As long as they are in school, children are confined in-doors for but five or five and a half hours a day. Children do not change at once into men and women at the age of fourteen, and should not be expected, at first, to do a full day's work. Thirty-two States have recognized this, and have declared that for the first two years of their working life children must have a shorter day. Five States have decreed an eight-hour day. These include two States that rank next to us in manufacture, New York and Illinois. Five other States allow a nine-hour day. Twenty States allow a ten-hour day. One State has an eleven-hour day, while Pennsylvania cruelly declares that children may be worked twelve hours a day. Only one State is worse (Alabama), which allows a thirteen-hour day for its children.

Even the following States in that section, which we have come to look down upon in child-labor matters, have either a nine, ten or, in one case, an eleven-hour law: Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana and Arkansas.

Manufacturers in other Southern States complain that they can not adopt the ten-hour day as long as Pennsylvania allows its twelve hours a day for children.

Finally, our law is most indefensibly cruel on the subject of night work. Night work is forbidden in Pennsylvania for fourteen and fifteen year old children. Thus, by an Act of the Legislature, it has been declared that night work injures children of those ages and must stop. And yet an exception is made and legally admitted injury is allowed in the one industry above all others where night work is most common and where the largest number of children is employed—the glass industry. Truly, when this law was passed in 1905, we asked bread of the Legislature and were given stone. Full grown men in the glass industry work only half of the time at night—first a week of day work, then a week at night. Only so can they stand it. On their night shifts the boys begin at five in the evening and leave the works between two and three in the morning in all kinds of weather, to make their way to their homes in the dark.

At the side of the blower and gatherer stands the little "cracker-off" boy who breaks the cooling, wax-like glass from the end of the blow pipe after the chimney or bottle has been left in the mold; sitting at the feet of the blower is the "holding-mold" boy, who opens and shuts the molds; then the "sticker-up" or "warming-in" boy takes the ware from the mold and holds it to the "glory-hole," reheating the mouth that it may be shaped by the gaffer, or finisher; from the finisher the "carry-in" boy takes the ware to the lehr, where it is properly tempered and made ready for packing.

The glass work exception was made in our law because of the claim that the industry could not exist without the help of the fourteen or fifteen year old boys. How false this claim is, appears from the experience of Illinois and Ohio, which rank respectively third and fifth, with Pennsylvania in glass manufacture. These States have found that night work by boys is not essential. They have both forbidden it and the industry has not suffered. In fact, it increased faster in those States, according to the United States census of 1905 than it did in Pennsylvania—an increase of 98 per cent. in both Illinois and Ohio since the year 1900, as compared with an increase of but 26 per cent. in Pennsylvania. Why should any night work for children be allowed any longer in our State?

Efforts were made two years ago, and will undoubtedly be made again this year, to break down the present law at a point where it fortunately is strong.

Chief Factory Inspector Delaney declares that the law should allow children to work under fourteen when it is found that the families are so poor as to need the child's earnings.

The Child Labor Committee is unqalifiedly against such an exception as this.

Those who give serious thought to the child labor question almost without exception find themselves, at first, in favor of exceptions in cases where the families are very poor and a brave little boy, for example, wants a special dispensation which will allow him to add his three dollars a week to the family's income. But almost as uniformly do these people swing about into opposition to such exceptions, when they have taken the trouble to examine carefully into the cases where this need is alleged to exist, and if they have also looked into the operation of the alternative plan where no exceptions are made and where help is given through some private agency, if the need is found to be genuine. The first cause of this right-about-face in opinion is the discovery of the large proportion of cases where the tears of the mother shed at the desk of the officer asked to make the exception have been found to represent no such conditions as make necessary the earnings the child might bring in. This is proved wherever careful investigation of such cases has been undertaken. A second reason for the changed opinion is the realization of the difficulty which faces an official who is empowered to make the exception. The very fact that he has the power, as soon as this becomes known, causes a great increase in the number of those who claim to need that an exception be made in their cases. He can no longer say in reply to their entreaties that he is not allowed to make exceptions. He has no way by which to learn whether the need which is alleged is real. The line of least resistance is to give the family the benefit of the doubt and grant the certificate. Life is soon made a burden for this official unless other applicants are similarly "excepted" and the beginning of the end of effective enforcement of the law is in sight. This is not an imaginary picture.

Six States, Illinois, Minnesota, Wisconsin, New Jersey, Rhode Island and Kentucky, have tried poverty exceptions and have had to repeal them, because, as the Commissioner of Labor in Wisconsin describes it, "nearly everybody began to be poor."

In most other States tne forces that are fighting the child labor evil have the help of their officials in meeting this natural but ill-advised demand for a poverty exception.

The Chief Factory Inspector of Ohio in his report of 1906 writes as follows:

"Discretionary power should not be vested in any authority to suspend the operation of the law on account of the plea of the widow and the orphan, no matter how worthy. From experience I am convinced that this practice would be throwing down the bars to flagrant violations of the law. The cause of the widow and orphan should and I believe will be met in some other way than by jeopardizing the lives of our future citizens by premature toil."

The Child Labor Commission appointed by the Mayor of Rochester, N. Y., in its report last February, used the following words:

"We consider the question whether this careful enforcement of the law entailed hardship upon many families who need the income which their children were thus not allowed to earn. We are happy to to say that we beileve there is very little of this kind of hardship.

"We believe that very few if any cases of real hardship followed the refusal to permit the child to work for wages."

The State of Connecticut faced the problem, and settled it, as far back in 1872. Its decision is recorded thus in the Official History of the Compulsory Education Laws of that State.

"When the bill embodying this law was reported to the Legislature by the Committee on Education in 1872 it contained a provision to the effect that parents whose 'pecuniary condition was such as to render the attendance of their children inexpedient or impracticable' should be exempt from its requirements. But on motion of a leading member of the House the bill was amended and that provision unanimously stricken out; thus committing the Legislature, and the State, to the policy that no child shall be deprived of the privileges of the schools because his parents are poor."

We do not deny that there are genuinely needy families in all our larger cities, but let us see what it means to put the children of such families at work.

By supporting the fourteen-year-age limit in the forms of labor covered by the law, as I assume we all do, we place ourselves on record as believing that no child under that age can engage steadily in such work without suffering from it, either physically or through the curtailed schooling involved. If work under fourteen did not mean injury, we would have stood for only a thirteen or a twelve-year age-limit. Or, did we not believe that cash-boy work under fourteen was injurious, we would have exempted that kind of work from the operation of the law. To favor an exception to the law is thus to admit that the injury in a given case is justified in order to avoid the greater injury—poverty. Until we analyze it, we do not realize the heartlessness of such an argument. In the home of want is a twelve-year-old boy who could earn three dollars a week—let it be assumed—if allowed to work. We will assume also that it is absolutely necessary that this amount each week in the form of relief should be added to the family's income. Who shall the relieving agency be—the twelve-year-old boy, whose future is already handicapped beyond his fellows because less fed, less clothed and with probably less schooling than they? Shall this child be further handicapped in the struggle before him by being compelled to undergo the injury of working under the legal age—an injury which we recognize by specifying that age is the law? Is there any reason why relief in such cases is less a public responsibility than it would be had there been no workable child in the family? To their credit, the relief societies of our larger cities have all answered, "No." And where this has not yet been done, is it not ours to urge that exactly this step be taken, instead of admitting that it is right to allow the burden to rest upon the shoulders of a child? Or, to look at the problem in the large and on the economic side, is it a wise social economy that decreases the chance that this boy at twenty-five may be able to furnish adequate support to his family for the rest of his life merely in order that for two years in childhood, he may pay three dollars a week in poor relief to the members of his father's family?

In several cities, including Philadelphia and Pittsburg, this relief has purposely not been given through a regular relief society, and the payments have been called not "charity" or relief, but "scholarships."

Leaflets on these subjects are being prepared by the Philadelphia Child Labor Committee and may be had on application to that office, 1338 Real Estate Trust Building.

Mr. M. K. Crist, of Lancaster, being absent Dr. E. J. Stewart, of Lancaster, was called upon and spoke as follows on "Poverty and Pauperism:"

It is indeed to be regretted that circumstances were such as to preclude the presence of the member to which this paper was assigned.

All through the ages poverty and pauperism has been a subject for consideration. The subject as we have it is distinctly one of the Christian era.

From earliest history we find mention of the pauper and those in distress. In ancient times, in Greece, provision was made for the care of the wounded, and of their poor who had no property—over $60 in our money.

In Roman history the poor and those in distress were looked after more or less from a political standpoint, and only at the time of Charlemagne was the proper conception given to the relief of these people. In the year 779 there was great distress throughout the land, and Charlemagne, in order to meet it was the first to conceive of the idea of meeting it by taxation.

In the early Jewish history pauperism was dealt with principally in their own tribe. It was circumscribed by lineal lines, and the alien in their midst received no consideration. But from the time of Charlemagne and Luther the alien and others in distress were given due consideration.

In the time of Luther there was more systematic consideration given to the pauper and those in need. It was Luther who, in a letter to his government suggested that no relief be given until due examination, and then only as an absolute necessity.

As to the causes of poverty and pauperism sociological workers are agreed that sickness, the loss of one or both parents, old age and improvidence, make up the list. One of the English writers places old age at the head of the list. Technically considered, in law pauperism embraces all those unfortunates who are placed at public expense for their keep; that is for their maintenance, and funds are raised by taxation. In the broadest meaning of this subject poverty and pauperism are not synonymous terms. Poverty is an acute condition. We find men and women in every locality who by reverses and changed circumstances are placed at our hands for relief, and by a little assistance they are able to resume their former condition. But pauperism is a chronic state. They are dependent upon charity for the rest of their lives, and it is in that class that we find the flotsam and jetsam of human society.

I will enumerate a few of the general principles held by sociological workers in the solution of pauperism. For the control of pauperism there is not to-day a panacea; the proper solution of the question is yet in the future..

First. It is agreed that indiscriminate almsgiving is one of the general principles to be laid down in the control of pauperism.

Second. To remove the cause, and bring those who are dependent back to self-support. In order to bring about this change we must have well-regulated plans worked out in the hands of experts; those who are familiar with every detail of gathering data, and with tabulating statistics. And the help that is given must be sufficient help, but not enough to tempt those receiving it to be dependent upon charity, or, in other words to surrender their personal independence, and beggars should be received into institutions where there is a certain degree of means for their employment as their bodily condition will permit.

I hold that the constructive efforts that can be put forth are of far greater import than any others. To create in the home a family pride, and to remove the children from demoralizing influences is far better than any palliative measures we may institute.

Whether the relief shall be given in the home or in an institution must rest with the local authorities. Aside from this there is a class of people who are dependent on charity, who must be looked after, no matter from where they come. Those are the physically and mentally infirm.

At this Convention we have come for the solution of this problem, but the adequate solution of it is in the future. But I am not pessimistic as to the solution of the question. I am one of those with the lively hope that this matter will be solved and that its difficulties will vanish.

Every one of us should be justly proud that we are citizens of a

State that has made such rapid progress and great strides in the amelioration of human ills, and we should be proud of the action of the Legislature in placing at the disposal of our charity workers such vast sums of money. We have come to this convention that we may profit thereby; that we may learn from one another; that we may catch from each other the high resolve to go back to our institutions and place in operation there the suggestions and the information we have gathered here, that our institutions may profit thereby.

Applause.

Mr. Levi Thomas submitted the following paper, "Report of Delegate to National Conference of Charities and Corrections," which was received with applause.

THE THIRTY-FIFTH NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF CHARITIES AND CORRECTIONS HELD AT RICHMOND, VA., MAY 6TH TO 13TH INSTS., 1908.

This Convention was composed of 583 delegates and visitors (of whom your President and the writer were two); of these delegates, 355 were men and 233 were women. They hailed from thirty-seven States of our Union, as follows: New York, 93; Massachusetts, 66; Maryland, 36; Indiana, 18; Virginia, 58; Oklahoma, 4; Pennsylvania, 26. Also, one delegate from Sweden.

The professional standing of these delegates were as follows:

Juvenile Court—Officers, Judges, Clerks and Probationers.

Chairman and Trustees of State Charity Schools and Boards and other charitable organizations.

Superintendents of Reform Schools, Neglected and Dependent Children, Industrial Training Schools, Boys' Clubs, Play Grounds, Orphanages, Homes for the Blind, Homes for Nervous and Backward Children, and Schools for the Deaf,

You will readily see that to give you even a faint idea of the purpose of this body, composed, as it was, of representative men and women from all parts of this great country, all animated by the same motive, the betterment and uplifting of our fellow men, would be an effort that is beyond the scope or intent of this paper, and more than you would have time to hear and beyond the ability of the writer to perform.

It would be natural to expect that the different sections of the country represented here, would exert some influence, locally, in their sentiments. This was noticeably absent. It seemed that the delegates from the South rather outdid the delegates from the North in their desire for the education of the negro, both morally and physically. The people of the South are fully alive to the wants of their section, and deplore the large number of them that are unable to read and write. However, their progress along these lines is remarkable. In speaking of the great increase of the white plague among the negroes, one delegate advocated the establishment of asylums for them in Colorado. Their manner of living in close, ill-ventilated quarters diminish their power to resist disease.

It was stated that before the war, the negro population was almost immune from insanity and free from drunkenness. The Central State Hospital for the Insane now contains about 1200 colored inmates. A large delegation visited this institution at Petersburg and were handsomely entertained by Dr. W. F. Drewery, Superintendent.

Six sections were held each day. In order that you may be able to form some idea of its scope, I will briefly outline the program for May 8th:

10 A. M.
Subject 1—"Children in Institutions—Are They Prepared for Future Citizens and Parents?"
Subject 2—"Criminals—Discipline and Employment of United States Prisoners."
Subject 3—"Needy Families—The Limitations of Charity in Dealing with the Unemployed."
Subject 4—"Public Health—The Relation of Bad Housing Conditions to the Charity Workers."
11 A. M.
Subject 1—"Use and Misuse of Statistics on Social Work."
Subject 2—"Old Age Pensions."
Subject 3—"Statistical Test in Children's Work."
2.15 P. M.
Subject 1—"Meeting of Probation and Parole Officers."
8.00 P. M.
General Session in St. Paul's Church (for all).
Subject—"Criminals—Their Punishment and Reformation"—By W. H. Whitaker, Superintendent of Indiana Reformatory.

The meetings of this day were all well attended, a high degree of interest being manifest. The discussions following the reading of the papers were lively and instructive. The 8 p. m. meeting, above noted, was addressed by W. H. Whitaker. He particularly impressed me as a man of great influence and personality. The magnetism of his bearing and presence, seems to me, could inspire men to believe and follow him. He advocates "love and a spirit of a square deal" to these unfortunates would mean the salvation of a number of them. The brutal handling of convicts was condemned. The denial of liberty was cited as the sole punishment that should rightfully be administered to felons and youthful offenders."

"Old Age Pension" was discussed at the 11 a. m. meeting by F. L. Hoffman, of the Prudential Life Insurance Company. He believes it is ill-advised, and it would remove many incentives for thrift among working people, that poverty in old age is principally the result of ill-spent years, ill-spent earnings, or ill-spent savings.

A fair and honorable solution of this question to my mind would be when a man and wife, native-born, have lived as honest, sober, industrious citizens, paid taxes and raised and educated a large family, and by reason of the performance of such duties of good citizenship, find themselves unable to maintain themselves after reaching three score years, would be for the State or county to provide for them comfortably outside of institutions, so they need not be separated in their old age.

In the discussion on Juvenile Court work, four judges and eighteen probationers took part, Judge Julian W. Macks' address was the most prominent. Judge De Lacy, of Washington, D. C., said "We do not want Judges so good as to be good for nothing." Judge Adams, of Cleveland, talked of the probation officer, "Ladies with lace and long kid gloves don't go with the kids." He said the boys like firemen and policemen as probation officers. They look up to them and respect their official positions and uniform.

The paper on Child Labor, by Florence Kelly, was interesting. The main obstacles to the enforcement of the law as she views it, is the question whether the child shall be able to work at twelve, fourteen or sixteen years of age. The idea that a boy must be either at play or school up to twelve or fourteen years of age is hard for some old farmer boys to indorse. We were brought up to get out in the morning, do the chores, go to school at nine o'clock, play at recess and noon, home again at four o'clock, do the chores and to bed, and as a result we were in good health and were happy.

No doubt there is great need of well-devised child labor laws for factory districts when to help maintain the family, children are compelled to work to the detriment of their school and play hours. Unless the State or county comes along to help supply these large families, partially dependent on the labor of their children, with food and clothing to enable them to attend school, it seems to me the Child Labor law will prove a failure as is the case with the compulsory educational laws. In many parts of the country, the enrollment has increased under the recent efficient enforcement of the law. But does it keep them in school. "I would be glad to be informed how they can keep them at school when their parents are unable to provide proper clothing and sufficient food. The proposition is now advocated by many persons familiar with the enforcement or the attempt at enforcement of the compulsory education law to provide such food and clothing. It will never be successful and its supporters will never see the full enforcement of its provisions until the above-named features are provided for by State or county.

With these very imperfect extracts of the work of this convention, I will conclude with a word about Richmond and its people. Governor Swanson at the opening meeting made a very eloquent address, and later entertained us very delightfully at a reception at his residence. The freedom of the city was extended and the hospitality for which the people of Virginia are noted, was everywhere in evidence. How delightful is the heart-openness so characteristic of the South. With hearts uplifted and new desires to work while the day lasted, we turned our faces homeward with a renewed impulse to labor for the further advancement and improvement of this unfortunate class of our population.

John W. Kellor, of New York, says "the theory and practice of modern charity does not stop with the treatment of conditions as they are found. It goes deep into the subject and has found that in past ages too much attention has been given to effect and too little to cause.

It recognizes that if a poor man falls ill it is economy on the part of the State to make him well in as short a time as possible that he may return to the support of his wife and family. So all along the different departments of this work—our ambition should be when there is a possibility to do so, to return to the ranks of good citizenship, all that are capable of improvement, all that are normal, not their confinement or punishment, but their cure.

The word "charity" embodies nearly all the activities we are considering, while it covers a multitude of sins, it also includes a multitude of virtues. The Good Book says "Though you have faith to move mountains and have not charity, it availeth nothing." St. Paul says, "Though I speak with tongues of men and angels and have not charity, I am become as a sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal."

I believe the time is not far distant when there will be less preaching of creed, less contention over doctrinal questions and more advocacy of the good work which saves men's bodies as well as their souls. The time is past for nations to war to uphold doctrines or faith. The peaceful warfare of the future, may we hope, will be for the benefit and uplifting of the conditions of our fellow-men.

At the conclusion of the reading of this paper the Convention adjourned until 1.30 p. m.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Devotional exercises were conducted by Rev. Charles H. Shaw, of the Baptist Church, West Chester.

Col. E. P. Gould, of Erie, Chairman of the Committee on Legislation, presented the following report, prefacing it with these remarks:

I wish to say that the report is not as complete as I intended to make it. I endeavored to get the information which every delegate needs. I wrote a letter to the General Agent of the Board of Public Charities asking him to furnish the information, as they are the only ones who can furnish it. First, a list of all the poor districts that are managed by County Commissioners as ex officio Directors of the Poor; also of the counties managed by the Directors of the Poor that were elected as such; also a list of all the counties managed in part by the Directors of the Poor and part under the Overseer system; and, lastly, a list of those wholly under the Overseer system, and I received no answer to my inquiries. For that reason I cannot give the information.

There is scarcely a county in the State that is governed under the general law with reference to the whole State. Nearly every poor district comes under some special Act. It has been held by the highest courts that to repeal a local act it must be specially repealed, and not by a clause at the end of a general law.

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE.

As no session of the Legislature has been held since the meeting of our last Convention, there are no new laws to consider and explain. The principal business of the Legislative Committee will, therefore, be to call your attention to what new legislation should be recommended, and perhaps refer to some of the complications that have arisen from defects and mistakes in the laws that have been passed.

First. What new legislation should this Association propose to advance the interests and objects it seeks to accomplish? One of the most important is to secure from the State a small annual appropriation to this Association to enable it to pay the expenses of these Conventions. It is imperative that we have the most advanced and experienced experts from all parts of the country to counsel and advise the delegates upon all the subjects with which they have to deal in the various positions which they occupy. The Program Committee cannot invite such talent to come and address our conventions unless their expenses, at least, are paid. This cannot now be done with the limited means which at present comes into our treasury. Were any of the delegates personally benefitted in any way by our annual meetings, there might be some plausible objection to such an appropriation. But such is not the case. But when we consider how great has been the good results to the people of the whole State in the improved methods of administering the poor laws, the well-conducted almshouses and county homes, and the more scientific and humane methods of caring for the insane and other unfortunate wards of the State, all, or nearly all, of which have been brought about through the influence of this Association, and when we further consider that the people of the State are the only beneficiaries of the work of this Association, it does not seem possible, when this is understood that any one would object to an appropriation from the State to advance the good work of the Association.

Perhaps there is no more needed change in our laws than an act to make uniform throughout the State, poor law administration. This matter has been long and carefully considered. Several attempts have been made to accomplish it, but all have thus far failed. And from past experience, when we consider how various and diverse are the methods in vogue, and the personal interests involved, we cannot but conclude that any wholesale attempt to change the laws to an uniform system will prove futile. However, we can work effectively to bring about this much desired end by constantly advocating the benefits of county districts and an uniform system. By this method counties having township districts under the overseer system have been changed to the county plan, and others will follow; and then, when most of the counties have poor districts co-extensive with their respective counties, and not till then, will it be possible to pass an act through the legislature making uniform the laws governing the management of the poor, and distribution of the poor funds.

The last Legislature passed acts fixing the salaries of the Directors of the Poor in the State, and at the end of those acts is attached a general repealing clause of all inconsistent acts. Our highest Courts have held, as a general proposition, that such a section in a general act does not repeal a local act relating thereto; although one Common Pleas Judge has decided to the contrary with reference to the Directors' Salary Acts. In most of the counties having Directors of the Poor local acts control the management of the districts, and the compensation of the directors is fixed by local laws. In some of the counties county auditors, in auditing the accounts of the Directors of the Poor have passed and approved the salaries of the directors as provided by the salary acts of the last Legislature. In other counties the Directors receive only the salaries or compensation provided by the local acts.

Instead of recommending amendments to the general acts covering this subject, it is thought better to recommend to each district affected, that desires to come under the general act, to have bills introduced in the Legislature repealing so much of their respective local acts as relate to the compensation of directors.

There is, however, a more serious question growing out of the aforesaid salary acts, viz.: What effect do they have in counties having Directors of the Poor in districts not co-extensive with their respective counties? It seems to be a disputed question whether the salary acts of 1907 relate to such districts at all. There is nothing in the acts relating to, or limiting in any way, the size of the districts where there are directors; and yet the salaries, by those acts, are regulated by the population of the whole county, and this would seem to exclude directors in districts not co-extensive with the county. If this view prevails, and no doubt it will, then the directors in Lycoming, Lackawanna and some other counties could not legally be paid under the general salary acts.

There is one more difficulty. In most of the districts there are three directors only, but in a few there are more; for instance, Lancaster has five, and in the Scranton poor district there are seven. The salary acts fixes the salaries of the directors without any reference to the number of directors in a district. How the Courts will interpret those acts with reference to their relation to districts having more than three directors, it is difficult to foretell.

Under all of these circumstances, it is thought best to recommend that the subject of making any changes desired by the directors of any district or county wishing to come under the salary acts of 1907 be referred to the solicitors of the respective districts to prepare and have presented to the next Legislature local acts that will accomplish the result desired.

E. P. GOULD, Chairman.

President Smith:—We will be favored with some remarks by Miss Stille, of West Chester, one of the Daughters of the American Revolution:

Miss Stille said: Mr. President and Members of the Association:

I have been a member of the Children's Aid Society about a quarter of a century. To-day I will digress from the subject a little and say a few words on behalf of the Daughters of the American Revolution. All through the papers and addresses of this Convention the interest of the child seems to be the keynote. It will interest you to know that the interest of the child is also the keynote of the Daughters of the American Revolution. Being a member of the State Executive Committee I represent nearly four thousand women in Pennsylvania, and I represent 70,000 women of the United States. It has been charged that we are establishing an aristocracy. We do not claim that, although we do claim to be the blue blood of the nation. Our fathers gave us our Society. Pennsylvania is second to no State in the Union. She is the keystone of the original thirteen States, and she maintains her position as the keystone of the forty-six States to-day.

Oklahoma gave us a Constitution that includes prohibition.

This is an historic county. We have in Chester county Brandywine, around which clusters memories dear to many; we have Valley Forge, where a glorious victory was won.

I was rather disappointed to find that the flag was not in evidence at the banquet last night—I mean on the tables, placed there for us. Still, the green study is very refreshing (as is your coming to us), and the impress of the verdancy of the palms is evident, from the bright things you have said and the material you have brought to us for mental improvement.

It is the duty of every American citizen to remain standing when "The Star Spangled Banner" is being rendered. The band yesterday stood as they played it, which is unusual. Surely they were not as feeble-minded as some others (Applause).

I appreciate the tribute that Mr. Fuller paid when he said the single sisters were the sunshine of the world; at least he said the married women were not (Laughter).

In the recent exercises at Philadelphia the Liberty Bell was placed on an old wagon drawn by old farm horses and guarded by soldiers in Continental costume. Some of the people took exception to it, they said the City of Philadelphia had spent a great deal of money to procure a handsome truck on which that old bell should always be exhibited and that it was an insult to Philadelphia that it should be placed on an old wagon, with old farm horses to draw it, and they knew not until I told them it was historical.

The English general threatened to melt the Liberty bell into bullets, but the bell was hidden under the Zion Lutheran Church in Allentown. That was why the bell was on the old wagon that day.

At the last meeting of the Legislature a bill was passed appropriating one thousand dollars to mark that site. The church has been renewed twice, but they will mark directly in front of it. Governor Stuart signed the bill, the grand Governor that he is, and I was selected a member of that committee, and we have selected a boulder weighing six tons, a bronze tablet made by a Pennsylvania firm, and next month it will be unveiled. But don't forget that the old wagon was historical and that was why it was used, and remember that God made Washington childless, that he might be the Father of His Country. (Applause).

The band from the institution at Glen Mills here favored with music, which received hearty applause.

Mrs. E. S. Lindsey here read the following paper, "Play as a Factor in Child Development," which was received with applause:

Preliminary to the reading of the paper Mrs. Lindsey said: I am afraid you will feel a good deal as a man did who was in the gallery listening to a prayer offered by a celebrated anatomist at a meeting of physicians. He began like this: "We thank Thee for the cerebellum; we are grateful beyond measure for the cerebrum; we appreciate the medulla oblongata; we know what the ligamentum muchae means; we are very thankful for the inferior and superior maxillaries by which we masticate the food so graciously given us,' and at that time the man in the gallery shrieked, 'but above all, we thank Thee for the muscles by which we are able to 'git,' and we don't care to know the names of them.'

We heard a great deal about germs yesterday, and being a very ardent champion of the dog it interested me.

At the National Conference at Richmond we heard a learned scientist trying to do away with all domestic pets, and he announced that the only thoroughly sanitary pet that any child or other person should be allowed to possess was the modern Teddy bear; and when I return home I had my own Teddy bear submitted to a microscopical examination and he was plum full of germs." (Laughter.)

The paper follows:

PLAY AS A FACTOR IN CHILD DEVELOPMENT.

Dr. Johnston once said to Boswell that a woman speaking in public always reminded him of a dog walking on two legs; the wonder was not that the dog did it well, but what the Dickens did the dog want to do it at all for? Now I didn't want to do it at all, and I wanted to do it still less when I read your program and realized how unworthy I was at least to be numbered with the elect. However, I can but offer you a few of my untutored thoughts.

Several years ago I visited a truly ideal institution; when about to leave, the Superintendent said, "Mrs. Lindsey, we would be glad of any criticisms or suggestions." "I have but one to offer," I replied. "I have been here five hours and have not heard a child laugh." One of the truest interpreters childhood ever had, Louisa Alcott, said, "Always feel safe about your boy while he whistles, and your girl while she laughs heartily." And yet it has taken so many long weary years for the apostles of laughter to rally their tiny disciples around them, and call upon the world to give them their birthright of joy.

Nineteen hundred and eight years have passed since the light of the Judean dawn fell upon a baby's face, which even then gave tidings of great joy, and to-day it is the joy of the child we seek, and the sullen, the conservative and the pessimist is aghast as he reads: "With twenty-nine States represented in the attendance of over four hundred members, the second Play Congress convened in New York City on September 8th, for a session of five days." Read the splendid report of this convention in "Charities" of October 3d. "From sixty-six play grounds a year ago, the number of cities in which playgrounds have been in use has grown to one hundred and eighty-five, while one hundred and eighteen others are planning their immediate establishment."

No one has done more for this great movement than Dr. Luther Gulick, of New York, and I can give my personal testimony from years full of hearty frolic and mischief in a New Hampshire village that he and his brothers knew how to play. It is from that helpful, normal boyhood that he draws his inspiration and knows what the boy wants—what the boy needs.

A few weeks ago a sad instance illustrated to me the pathos of the child's cry for more life—more joy. A bright little boy, nearly blind ran away from an institution and reached our town nearly exhausted; he was given into the charge of the Children's Aid Society and detained by us until his eyes could be tested. One Sunday he accompanied me to church and I described to him the lovely figure of the Christ above the altar and far above a cross. "George, can you see the beautiful face of Christ?" The nearly sightless eyes strained towards the altar, then filled slowly with tears, while he whispered with a sob, "Oh, Mrs. Lindsey, I can only see the cross." Think of the pitiful little lives that only see the cross; they are all about us.

Johnston maintained that Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy was the only book that ever kept him awake, but I fear by anatomy of mirth will produce a gentle slumber in my audience, however, bear with me while I try to put before you, in a homely manner, the results of my limited experience.

I have listened for many years to splendid papers on the management, the training, the nourishment, the careful clothing and the medical care of the dependent child, and I have heard so little of the fun and good times created for the pleasure and the expansion of the poor little human animal. How true it is that there are ways and ways of offering pleasure to the child. Don't hedge it around with too many restrictions. I remember a well-meaning woman offering an exquisitely dressed doll to a sick child in the children's ward, "Now, dear, don't crush its beautiful dress or unbraid its hair, and have nurse put it away carefully at night." To her surprise she was greeted with a storm of angry sobs and the bitter exclamation, "Oh take that thing home with you, I wanted a live dolly." Or, again, does it not seem incredible that there are good women who prefer the immaculate child with a look of sullen resignation on his baby face to the dirty, happy little scamp, revelling in mother earth? Accuse me of being an improper guardian of children if you will, but I never feel so safe and happy about our Children's Aid boys as when they greet me with sand in their hair, their faces tattooed molasses bas-relief, and portions of their trousers conspicuous by their absence. When you and I were young, if we made a nice mud pie and baked it in the sun, and perhaps carelessly threw it at some old deacon who had incurred our displeasure, we were accounted naughty and punished in the good old-fashioned way, and when Johnny, playing ball vigorously in the street, broke Miss Deborah's window, she did not leave her baking and seizing Johnny by the suspenders drag him at once to the Juvenile Court. Oh, those glorious old days; when we drank water from the meadow bog and digested every germ, played ball in the street, threw pebbles, made mud pies and never knew we were delinquents.

I have always stoutly contended that there was no child that I could not teach to play. This summer I met my Waterloo. He was only six, yet he moved with rigid dignity; all day he sat like the melancholy Dane. "To be or not to be" seemed the question. Finally, in desperation I said, "Albert, we can no longer keep you in a children's Home, you will have to go to an old gentleman's home." "What do the old gentlemen do?" the solemn voice inquired. "Oh," I said vaguely, "they sit in the sun and sleep a good deal." The first animation his face had shown, brightened it as he inquired eagerly, "Say, will you move me there to-morrow?"

Play as a factor in child development is an ever broadening subject and we have "Playgrounds in the Prevention of Tuberculosis," "Public Playgrounds in their relation to Juvenile Delinquency," "Playgrounds and Board of Education," and many others too numerous to mention. Dr. Favill, President of the Chicago Tuberculosis Institute, declared: "It is not at all sufficient that the children be protected during their helpless years from danger, but that they be furnished with sturdy disease resisting bodies. The problem of tuberculosis involves a deep conviction as to the principles of living which even though it can be inculcated in their youth would be as rapidly eradicated by their contact with their elders, unintelligent and fixed in habit, except their knowledge and impulse can be kept alive by special advantages and inspirations."

Contrast the popular dances in our great playgrounds that seem, as one writer has said, "To revive the soul of the oldest nations in Europe," with the gloomy restrictions of a Puritan child, taught to abhor dancing as the invention of the evil one. Contrast the glad ring of the Folk Song with poor Isaac Watt, spanked twenty-three times by an irate father to cure him of writing hymns, with the result that he produced "My Thoughts on Awful Subjects Dwell, Damnation and the Dead." Contrast the legitimate enjoyment of Sunday, compatible with the teachings of Him who walked through the corn with His Disciples or taught by the blue lake of Galilee, with the poor little Sunday victim of Cotton Mathers' sermons, relieved at noon by a few cold beans and corn bread and then three hours more of election and foreordination, and so at last, freedom has come to the child.

To quote from an article by Dr. Luther Gulick, entitled "Play and Democracy:" "The two great institutions that have to deal with children—the school and the home—rest primarily upon the development of the qualities of obedience. The playground alone affords to children the one great opportunity for cultivating those qualities that grow out of meeting others of like kind under conditions of freedom; it develops progressively, from babyhood on, that sense of human relationships which is basal to wholesome living. Thus the playground is our great ethical laboratory.

"Where there is no freedom there can be no self-control. The man whose limbs are shackled cannot control them. The man whose mind is shackled, cannot control his mind. The person who is compelled by force or fear, so that he is not free, has no self-control. The control of one's self is absolutely based upon having freedom to control one's self—a freedom to do wrong as well as right. So self-control of this higher type is primarily developed under the conditions of the playground, rather than under the conditions of the school and the home."

If I have succeeded in bringing home to you the child's plea, I am grateful to your patience and courtesy; for, as Judge Lindsey says: "The child is a wonderful human creature—a divine machine; we have much to expect from him, but he has much to expect from us, and what he returns depends largely upon what we give. We shall suffer with him whether we will or no if we do not share his burdens. Let us not weary of the struggle 'till the child gets a square deal, and until he does we cannot have and do not deserve that glorious manhood, that splendid citizenship that will come alone from duty done in childhood's sacred cause."

And now, may we not as individuals, return to our homes, pledged to investigate this matter of the playground; pledged to arouse public interest and enthusiasm? We realize that he who plays heartily may be tempted by one devil, but he who has no outlet for the great flood of animal spirits surging to find expression, is tempted by a thousand. To the tender heart of childhood, with its infinite capacity for joy and pain, we may well apply Othello's words: "But once put out thy light, thou cunningest pattern of excelling nature, and I know not where is that Promethean heat which can thy light relume."

The report of the Committee on Place of Meeting was here presented by its chairman, Dr. J. Lewis Shrodes, as follows:

The Committee on Place of Meeting unanimously recommend that the next convention be held at Bradford, McKean county, on the cordial invitation of the delegates, Messrs. Hon. E. A. Boyne and George T. Guy, also His Honor, R. J. Hoffman, Mayor of the city.

The city has 20,000 population and ample hotel facilities, and as convenient as to railroad accommodations as most cities in the State.

Bradford, Pa., October 14, 1908.

To Boyne and Guy, West Chester, Pa.:

Get convention for Bradford if you can.

R. J. HOFFMAN.

Hon. E. A. Boyne (Bradford-McKean Counties):—As the invitation has been read I personally extend to you a hearty invitation to visit us at your annual meeting next year. We will give you a warm reception, and it will be a great pleasure for us to take care of as many as you can bring. We will give you the warm heart and the glad hand. I hope to see you all there next year (Applause).

Upon motion of L. C. Colborn the report of the Committee on place of meeting was received.

President Smith:—We have with us one who is familiar with the workings of the Juvenile Court and who has advanced ideas on the enforcement af the law in relation to the delinquent husband and father. I have the honor of introducing to the Convention Hon. Wm. H. DeLacy, Judge of the Juvenile Court, of Washington, D. C.

Judge DeLacy was received with applause, and spoke as follows on the subject "Enforcement by the State of the Obligations of the Husband and Father to Support of Wife and Children."

Mr. President and Delegates:

It is an honor to address the ladies and gentlemen who are controlling the charitable work of the great State of Pennsylvania. I was very glad to note by your interesting discussions that, in the last analysis, the logic of the situation resolves itself into proper care of the child. You are the real State builders of our country; of our country, which, if it means anything, means the concern of all for each, and the concern of each for all. It stands for the social truth that the concern of the meanest and the most poverty-stricken member of the community is the concern of him who is most prosperous in the community. While you illustrate this truth in your daily lives, well it is for the country. Men and women are not perfect beings, and herein lies the opportunity for progress. He who is perfection itself has made us, and He who is infinitely good and infinitely beautiful has made us in His own image and likeness, and the story of man's aspiration towards the good and the true and the beautiful is the story of his progress and happiness, and in so far as he has failed to make progress towards his goal has he been miserable. The measure of our failure is often the measure of our ignorance and our weakness, as none knows better than you.

The story goes that man was originally circular in form and that he had four arms and four legs, but that on one fell occasion he neglected to offer sacrifice to the gods and they in anger cleft him in twain and the parts ran away and apart in terror, but ever since the parts have been seeking each other—and, when a man finds his other half, his happiness is complete, his cup of bliss is full—such is marriage and so it is for most Americans. The great body of the American people are virtuous; the great body of the American people are honest at heart, and clean and true, and devoted to their homes. But there are matrimonial failures and it is in relation to this subject rather than the Juvenile Court, that I am to speak. And yet this work is related to the child. If you conserve the home you conserve the proper environment of the child. The child in the home is not likely to prove a delinquent child if the home care is proper. The little boy who steals up behind the man who is reading his paper and squirts over his bald head the dirty water is not the criminal that the victim thinks him to be. Of course in the opinion of the victim there is no punishment too severe for that boy. But he is apt to grow up to occupy President Smith's place, in time.

We have in the District of Columbia an Act that is directed towards the conservation of the home. It was passed under the influence of that splendid example of American citizenship, who has so nobly served his country and his fellow citizens, President Roosevelt (Applause). While he is most severe with dishonesty and wrong doing in the seats of the mighty, there is no one whose ear is bent lower to catch the plaintive cry of the ignorant and the suffering, and he is always ready to extend his power to uplift the poor girl or the ignorant young man who has gone wrong. This Non-Support Act was passed March 23, 1906, and is entitled, "An Act making it a misdemeanor in the District of Columbia to abandon or wilfully neglect to provide for the support and maintenance, by any person, of his wife or of his or her minor children in destitute or necessitous circumstances."

Now, with your permission, I will read this Act. It has been drawn along model lines. Similar Acts may be found in forty-four States. In forty-one of them it is made a misdemeanor, to make it more easy of enforcement; in three States the failure to support wife and children has been made a felony. The Act reads as follows:

An Act making it a misdemeanor in the District of Columbia to abandon or wilfully neglect to provide for the support and maintenance by any person of his wife or of his or her minor children in destitute or necessitous circumstances:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any person in the District of Columbia who shall, without just cause, desert or wilfully neglect or refuse to provide for the support and maintenance of his wife in destitute or necessitous circumstances, or any person who shall, without just excuse, desert or wilfully neglect or refuse to provide for the support and maintenance of his or her minor children under the age of sixteen years in destitute or necessitous circumstances, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than five hundred dollars or by imprisonment in the workhouse of the District of Columbia at hard labor for not more than twelve months, or by both such fine and imprisonment; and should a fine be imposed it may be directed by the Court to be paid in whole or in part to the wife or to the guardian or custodian of the minor child or children: Provided, That before the trial, with the consent of the defendant, or after conviction, instead of imposing the punishment hereinbefore provided, or in addition thereto, the Court in its discretion, having regard to the circumstances and to the financial ability or earning capacity of the defendant, shall have the power to make an order, which shall be subject to change by it from time to time as circumstances may require, directing the defendant to pay a certain sum weekly for the space of one year to the wife, or to the guardian or custodian of the minor child or children, or to an organization or individual approved by the Court as trustee, and to release the defendant from custody on probation for the space of one year upon his or her entering into a recognizance, with or without sureties, in such sum as the Court may direct. The condition of the recognizance shall be such that if the defendant shall make his or her personal appearance in Court whenever ordered to do so within the year, and shall further comply with the terms of the order and of any subsequent modification thereof, then the recognizance shall be void, otherwise of full force and effect.

If the Court be satisfied by information and due proof, under oath, that at any time during the year the defendant has violated the terms of such order, it may forthwith proceed with the trial of the defendant under the original charge, or sentence him under the original conviction, or enforce the original sentence, as the case may be. In case of forfeiture of a recognizance and enforcement thereof by execution, the sum recovered may, in the discretion of the Court, be paid in whole or in part to the wife, or to the guardian or custodian of the minor child or children.

Sec. 2. That no other evidence shall be required to prove marriage of such husband and wife, or that such person is the lawful father or mother of such child or children, than is or shall be required to prove such facts in a civil action. In all prosecutions under this Act any existing provisions of law prohibiting the disclosure of confidential communications between husband and wife shall not apply, and both husband and wife shall be competent and compellable witnesses to testify to any and all relevant matters, including the fact of such marriage and the parentage of such child or children. Proof of the desertion of such wife, child, or children in destitute or necessitous circumstances, or of neglect to furnish such wife, child or children necessary and proper food, clothing, or shelter is prima facie evidence that such desertion or neglect is wilful.

Sec. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Superintendent in charge of the workhouse of the District of Columbia in which any person is confined on account of a sentence under this law to pay, out of any funds available, over to the wife, or to the guardian or custodian of his or her minor child or children, or to an organization or individual approved by the Court as trustee, at the end of each week, for the support of such wife, child, or children, a sum equal to fifty cents for each day's hard labor performed by said person so confined.

Approved, March 23, 1906.

The enforcement of this Act was placed in the Juvenile Court. The Juvenile Court of the District of Columbia was established on the 1st of July, 1906. During the first year of its operation, the fact that there was such a remedy at hand became gradually known, and we had that year some 254 cases before the Court, of which 42 went to the workhouse, and some $6,000 was collected for the benefit of the wives and children, in the manner I will indicate. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, we had 636 cases of non-support, of which 73 went to the workhouse, and we collected $21,888.56, for the benefit of wives and children. To-day we have about 245 families on the relief roll of that Court, who would otherwise be a burden on the taxpayers. The first year, $200 was appropriated to enable the Superintendent of the workhouse to pay the sums ordered by the Court. This year we have an appropriation of $2400, which would provide for about 160 families, for I usually sentence for a month, and as a rule they do not have to go back again. Sometimes men brought before the Court own property. Such men are heavily fined and the fine is turned over to the wife. If I find she doesn't understand the use of money, I direct it be kept by the clerk and paid to the wife, say, at the rate of $50 a month. The reasons for failure to support his wife and children are always enquired into. In 90 per cent. of the cases the men are to blame; in the other 10 per cent. perhaps the wives are at fault.

I think in courts of first instance we should always have presiding good men and the best specimens of citizenship (Applause). Take the ordinary comer into a police court; he is generally poverty stricken. How absurd to impose on him, and through him, on his family a fine that will drive them further into the mire, or to take the bread winner away from the family and incarcerate him. Wouldn't it be better to have every court authorized to parole such a prisoner? Fine him if he should be fined, but give him time to pay his fine. Or, if you send him to jail, keep him at work and let him pay his fine in instalments. Let him understand that the law is his friend and not his enemy, and that the law he has transgressed is protecting him. In a great percentage of cases you will in that way reach his heart (Applause). If you had that, in conjunction with probation, so first offenders might be permitted to go out again into activities of life, I believe you would save at least 60 per cent. of those who come into our courts for the first time.

It is my constant effort to bring families together and to patch up difficulties. The family is the true unit of the State; if we take good care of the families of the State all will be well with the State. I remember one Saturday afternoon after court had adjourned an irate man came into court having by the hand a girl about sixteen years old, and he wanted to send her to the reformatory. I invited him into the office. In the meantime a woman in tears, and surrounded with six children entered the clerk's office, and I learned they belonged to the man. He had the girl before me simply because she sided with the mother. I discovered it was his own drinking habits and his absurd jealousy of his wife that was the cause of the whole trouble. Three solid hours were spent with that family, but at the end of that time I had the satisfaction of seeing that man kiss his wife and take her out of court, and he told me he was going at once to an installment house to refurnish the house. That reconciliation has lasted up to this time. He is now buying a little home in the suburbs of Washington, and that family has been saved to our country (Applause).

I had another case in which when the man was arraigned in court, they produced a record of 43 convictions of himself for drunkenness. On each occasion he was fined. His wife would work and pay his fine and he would be released, to return home and beat her again, and the result was that the family of that man who could earn $5 a day was a public charge. His family was cared for by the Associated Charities.

I asked the man, which do you love more, your children or whisky? and he replied, "Whisky is my only pleasure and I won't give it up for anybody." "Very well you may go to the workhouse for six months." And he went down. Afterwards I was asked to witness the distribution of 100 overcoats given away by a prominent firm to 100 needy boys. I found this man's wife in the store with two of her children, and the owner of the establishment said, "that lady has come with one ticket and two boys; if there are two overcoats left at the end of the day she shall have both of them." I told him her story, and without a word to me, he had his clerks fit out the boys with overcoats and shoes and stockings. Later, a local contractor came to me and said, "Judge, I went to school with this man and if you will parole him I will give him $9 a week, and you may order whatever you think best to be paid to his wife and children." So I sent for him and he came up one Saturday morning, and we spent about three-quarters of an hour arguing whether or not he should give up drinking. I said, "You are not getting liquor in the workhouse?" and he replied, "No, sir." "Isn't it more honorable to do without liquor voluntarily on the outside, than to be compelled to do without it on the inside? You know it is not good for you, and yet you feel like taking it. Now if you will send your will along the line of your knowledge, and say to yourself, I will not take it, you can give up drink. No one needs to drink." He replied, "I guess I will take the pledge." And he took the pledge. That was last January. From that time to this he has kept it. I told him to go to the desk sergeant at his police precinct every Saturday night and pay him $8 to be turned over through the clerk of the court for the support of his family. Such men go on Saturday night before they can drink the money up, and pay the stipulated amount. I learned that this man was sending one of his daughters with the money to the station. I told him he must go in person so as to be scrutinized by the sergeant, and he has gone in person ever since, and that family is getting along all right.

I had another case, of a man of good family, but a lazy, idle fellow, and he had a wife and three children, who were being supported by charity when he was brought before the court. He was so lazy he wouldn't even wash himself. His relatives were ready to pay any fine I imposed. But he was sentenced to the workhouse for six months. I hadn't any idea of keeping him there that length of time. When a man has declared that he is going to reform, I parole him, and the balance of his sentence is held over his head subject to his good behavior. He knows then that there is but one person in the District that can put him in the workhouse and that is himself.

I seldom require these husbands to file a recognizance. I had one case of a man who was a theatrical manager who I was afraid would get out of the jurisdiction of the court and he was made to give bond. He left the jurisdiction, but the surety has been paying the wife the stipulated sum ever since.

Judge DeLacy here read several letters from persons who had been before him, in which the writers promised to do better and to make men of themselves and to care for their families, if he would give them a chance.

In these cases I have given them a chance, and they are doing well so far.

Some terrible cases come to light in the enforcement of this Act. Incidentally, I lecture these men on the evils of wrong doing. I remind them that 80 per cent. of the surgical operations on wives are rendered necessary by the immoral habits of the husbands. They are reminded that they run the risk of two foul diseases that cause so much misery.

Sometimes I discover that they are crowding the family into one room, both sexes being intermingled. I often find that the combined earnings of such families will get additional house room, if it is not squandered for drink or in other vicious habits.

My experience convinces me that it would pay the City of Washington to buy all the alley property and turn it into parks, thus forcing the denizens to live upon open streets within reach of the lamps and of the passers by.

This is, briefly, the work done under this law. It is done in an effort and with a purpose to rehabilitate the home. It is done at little expense to the community. It is done in a way to promote self-respect on the part of these husbands and fathers. I have one man who comes regularly and pays a certain amount to his family so that he may not get into trouble again. In the Juvenile Court, every penny gets to the family. There are no costs. I have one man who has established a little grocery and is supporting his wife and children, and declares it is the best thing that ever happened to him that he was brought into the Juvenile Court.

You, ladies and gentlemen, are, I repeat, the real State builders of the country, because you are bringing hope to the ignorant and the poor and the needy. It is the man and the woman who doesn't go to church who are sought out by you. And such need the care and the light you are giving them, too, with a faith that—

"As one lamp lights another nor grows less,
So nobleness enkindleth nobleness."

Applause.

Mrs. Rankin (Fayette):—How many of the cases have drink as part of the trouble?

Judge DeLacy:—Between 90 and 95 per cent.

Following Judge DeLacy's address Dr. J. J. Emmens, Superintendent of Somerset County Hospital for the Insane, read the following interesting paper, which was received with applause:

Mr. President, Directors of the Poor, Ladies and Gentlemen:

I hesitate to address this audience this afternoon. Indeed, I may truthfully say, I was loth to accept the invitation. This is the first convention of its kind I have ever had the pleasure of attending; and realizing as I do, the very great importance, the almost sacred nature of the work which this organization is undertaking, I fear I cannot do justice either to my subject or the occasion.

To one who visits either an almshouse or a hospital for the insane, either as an official inspector, a friend of a patient, or as one wishing only to satisfy their curiosity, the visit is usually a short one, the inspection rather superficial, and the general impression made is, that the institution is in "excellent order," in "fairly good condition," or "in a state of sad neglect." This impression is often a very erroneous one, and the conclusion reached may be at great variance to the actual state of existing affairs. The Hospital or Home with its new and elegant buildings, finely polished floors and walls, well kept lawns and trees, and very modern appliances throughout, from the standpoint of care and treatment of its inmates, may be very poorly managed. On the other hand, those unfortunates, confined in an institution built years ago, whose walls are gray and scarred, whose floor rough and unpolished, whose grounds do not consist of acres of lawn and foliage, so pleasing to look upon, may be, so far as their personal care, attention and general welfare is concerned, very much better off.

Before judging or attempting to criticize the general management of a Home or Hospital for the insane, one should have time to carefully observe all the circumstances connected with the place, and to thoroughly investigate, not only the conditions found on the surface, but also the little details, which after all, are of great importance and help to make up the vital machinery which helps to operate every public institution.

An almshouse or hospital for the insane is the microcosm, or little world, of the section in which it may be located. Within its confines we find the results of all sorts of diseases, both physical and mental; and also a host of living examples of those social maladies that degrade manhood, undermine our national strength, and threaten civilization itself. These latter sufferers are often the helpless victims of progress itself, the wreckage of overwork, worry, and mental strain, in a mind and body not capable of the task it has taken upon itself to perform. Here we find drunkenness and ruin; here is pauperism; here is illigitimacy; here is madness; here is crime in all its aspects; here is that monster, vice, in all its forms.

And what a family of strange characters, of eccentric individuals, of interesting persons we find here. What differences of disposition; what rival interests; what a conflict of motives; what pictures of distress and sadness; what objects of happiness and content; what display of selfishness and cowardice, and what examples, in their narrow way, of bravery and endurance. Here are legends and histories by the score; some humorous, some ghostlike, and some sad. What lofty ambitions many of these poor souls may have had at one time; what possibilities, had many of their early efforts been directed in proper paths. How many, once well and happy, with noble ideals and ambitions, prominent among their fellow men, with health and strength to guide them, who once loved their illusions and cherished their enthusiasms, have come here, sad, broken down specimens of humanity, to die. We find here those actually suffering and in misery; those grown sad and weary with life through constant misfortune; others fierce and resentful that the world has not treated them better; and some kind and appreciative of all that is done for them, patient and cheery, even though their suffering and burden be great. There are those well content with their lot in life, with its three square meals a day, a comfortable bed in which to sleep, tobacco, the papers, a sunny bench, agreeable companions, and very little or no work to do. What a glorious life for these. No cares, no want, no ambition, no worry. Nothing to do but live and that without an effort. The world owes them a living and they have come here to collect it. The place is not without its rivalries. One covets the captaincy of the barnyard, another the wood house, while he or she who waits upon the tables or is entrusted with some special work, feels far above the rest. Here we find the tale bearer, the slanderer, the flatterer and the liar. There are those who seek health and others who would gladly welcome death. What a little world this is to manage. The poor, the insane, the sick, the maimed, the blind. How shall we do it?

It is always easy to criticise, and criticisms may have its good results. It is ever more difficult to suggest and direct improvements. There is no one set of rules by which every institution may be governed. There are, however, certain underlying principles which may be followed everywhere.

First, Mr. Superintendent or Steward, you who have this important work to perform, before you attempt to govern and direct the lives of these irresponsible people, learn to know well and thoroughly govern and control yourself. Do you feel that you are equal to the task before you, and if not, do you try to fit yourself for the work? Do you make a study of institution government and do you interest yourself in the literature pertaining to your work? If not, you are losing every day, opportunities to better equip yourself for your special work and improve the condition of those in your charge. It is ever the tendency of men or women who live their lives in institution work to become narrow and lose that broad view of life, a thing so essential in those who have the lives of others to direct. I have felt this narrowing influence at times myself and we should all try to guard against it. Scatter sunshine and encouragement among those about you. Instill confidence and stir up ambition for better things and greater efforts in those who work and try to make themselves useful. Let your patients feel that you are their friend in all things. For he who has a friend is not alone and possesses one of the greatest treasures in life. Be careful of your habits and the moral impression which you create. Be frank and truthful and never betray the confidence that is placed in you. Ever remember that you can accomplish far more if you make your patients love and respect you, than by driving, by force, by punishment, and through fear. Try to appreciate the shortcomings of those about you as well as your own. Be slow to accuse; careful, moderate, yet firm in your punishment; and ever willing to forgive.

In the management of your institution establish certain rules for both employes and patients; and while it is a poor rule that has no exception, live up to them as closely as possible. I once visited a certain hospital in this State, and among other things, the man in charge told me with much pride that they ran the place without any rules at all. Before I finished my visit I was quite convinced of the fact, for it was very evident every minute.

One of the greatest problems to-day is the selection of competent attendants and nurses. After all, upon these employes and their efforts and interest in their work, depends largely your success. I regret to say, yet I believe, the vast majority of those caring for the insane in this and many other States, are thoroughly unfit to fill the positions they hold. This is not merely a conclusion of my own, but rather the opinion of most physicians engaged in this line of work. In the care and treatment of sane people suffering only with physical ailments, we are prone to employ skilled graduates or trained nurses at good salaries. On the other hand, most of the employes in our asylums who care for and nurse those affected not only in body but in mind as well, are totally without training, with absolutely no idea of the nature of insanity, and in many instances are allowed to drift along with no instruction at all. The salaries paid these attendants is from fifteen to twenty-five dollars a month. A splendid index of the type of man usually employed. These remarks do not apply to all institutions. There are those in this State in connection with which there are excellent training schools, where regular courses of training and instruction are given. This is in keeping with the more advanced ideas in hospital management. However, the fact remains the same, that in many institutions, and especially among the male nurses, incompetency is very evident. What would you think of a man who would resent, who would strike and frightfully abuse an insane patient, because, in his deluded state, he had called him some vile name? Would you regard him a competent man to take care of these poor defenceless people? There is no use shutting our eyes to such conditions merely because they are unpleasant to hear and especially unpleasant to investigate. It is to remedy and guard against such evils that these conventions are held; and, ladies and gentlemen, it is the special duty of those in charge, as well as yours, to find some means to guard well against the perpetration of outrages and cruelty upon the insane, and try, wherever possible, to better their present conditions. As evidence that such outrages have taken place, I need only call your attention to the fact that recently several guilty attendants were sentenced to prison by the Courts in one of our neighboring States. But who is most to blame for such conditions, the man who commits the crime, who perhaps is not capable of exercising better judgment, or those who select and place these untrained and incompetent people in the positions which so many of them hold? I mention these facts here because I wish to place myself on record before this convention, as entering a plea for the employment of better trained and more skilled nurses and attendants in the hospitals caring for the insane of this State. I believe it plausible and possible to establish a regular State training school for both male and female nurses, where they may receive a systematic course in this special line of work, from which the institutions throughout the State, and especially the smaller ones, might be supplied with competent help.

How do the inmates of your institution occupy their time? Perhaps there is no one thing more detrimental to both mind and body of your patients than idleness. The best all round cure for insanity in general is physical exercise in the form of work, and an abundance of it. For this reason the smaller county institutions have an advantage over the larger and much overcrowded State hospitals. In the former, especially where there is a farm in connection, there is ample work for all. In the latter, however, many of the patients have to remain idle because there is no employment for them. The insane make excellent and ever willing workers. I cannot claim the same for the inmates of our County Homes. Every institution, no matter how small, should have a carpenter shop, shoe shop, blacksmith shop, mattress room, and dressmaking department. They not only give employment to the inmates but they reduce largely the general running expenses.

There are two classes of cases still with us, both deserving of pity and consideration, which should not be confined in insane hospitals or County Homes. The one is the harmless epileptic; the other the inebriate or drug habituate. Hundreds of cases of epilepsy are being committed to our asylums to-day only because there is no other place for them. Because of their peculiar infirmity, it does not seem just to banish them to an asylum and confine them among a lot of mentally deranged and greatly disturbed people. I trust, too, the State of Pennsylvania, which receives, I believe, its fifth or sixth largest revenue from the manufacture and sale of spirituous liquors, may some day soon provide a suitable place, where those who fall from the use and abuse of alcohol, may be properly treated and cared for. They do not belong in asylums for the insane, but they do require careful moral and medical treatment; a treatment in a different environment and a treatment in which the time element, amounting to not days or weeks, but months or a year, is the greatest factor. These cases should be isolated from the others as much as possible. Teach your epileptics to care for one another, and find employment for them, which on account of their malady, will not be dangerous.

In the employment and management of the general help about institutions, one has numerous and ever changing difficulties to meet. This is largely a personal problem which everyone must solve for himself. The cheapest labor will not always be the most economical. Employ competent help; pay them well, and they will usually earn more than they receive. It is well to have a head to every department, and yet, bear in mind that too many bosses often create dissatisfaction and strife. Let every one, so far as possible, have certain specific duties to perform for which they may be responsible. Then if things go wrong you will know where to make amends. Be frank, open and just in your dealings, treat every one squarely, with consideration, and show favoritism to no one.

If you would accomplish much, always map out to-day the work for the morrow. Have your work definitely planned ahead, and never start the day wondering what you will do next. It is well to solicit opinions from those associated with you. Their advice is frequently valuable, and it stimulates their co-operation in your undertakings.

It is the growing tendency in this and other States to erect County Hospitals, that each section may care for its own insane. The results in those counties where this has been done demonstrates that the plan is successful and a step in the right direction. I take pleasure in announcing that Somerset county has decided to erect, and will break ground in the spring for a new modern hospital for the care and treatment of the insane. The buildings will be of brick and concrete and will have a capacity for from 225 to 250 patients. There will be accommodations for both indigent and private cases. Every effort will made to make this a thoroughly modern and model institution.

In closing, gentlemen, let me urge, yea, let me caution you who represent the guardians of the poor of this State, to use your best judgment and exercise the utmost care in the selection of those whom you place in charge of your hospitals and homes. Let not politics, friendship, personal favor, creed, or relationship influence you. But rather be guided by those sterling and finer qualities which go to make up the man of good sound moral principles and judgment. Lend to him your hearty co-operation and assist in every way possible the work he may undertake to accomplish. By so doing, you will make the path of these poor unfortunates so bright that they may catch the reflection of the skies even in their poor and humble surroundings.

May God's blessings rest upon the work which you have already accomplished, and may He ever give you the courage to fight and chivalry to make another's cause your own; and may there ever be present that hope for better things which makes the future rich in golden hues.

DR. J. J. EMMENS,
Supt. Somerset County Hospital for Insane, Somerset, Pa.

President Smith:—We have with us Mrs. Faulkner, of the Mercy Training School and I will ask her to give us a short talk.

Mrs. Faulkner:—Mr. President and Friends: I come with a grievance, because on the program we are called a Reform School. I am very glad to have heard Judge DeLacy, whom I have heard before, and I have had the pleasure of visiting his court, and I appreciate the splendid work he is doing there. I wish we had more such men holding people to their responsibilities; more men of his spirit and his willingness to help those who need help and to help parents to meet their responsibilities; there would then be less need for such schools as we have.

The Girls' House of Refuge is in the city, and we are trying to move to the country. It is behind a hideous wall and in an old building. We try to keep the girls busy, first, with industrial training half a day and in school half a day; we try to fill their time full, with work and play. Most of the girls come from broken homes, and such girls need a great deal of training. We have a farm near here, given to us by Mr. Alfred Harrison. We use the station at Darlington. Some of the girls are living in the old farm house there and in tents. I think it is a good thing to try and teach in the school the value of fresh air and sunshine. We have about fifty girls living in this small farm house and in the tents, at present. The children are very happy. We are building cottages, and we hope two of them will be finished for us to occupy January 1st. I am happy to say that our place in the city has been sold, so we must move. I believe the country is the best place for a school for the girl or boy. They get more outdoor life. The colored girls receive the same training as the white girls. They live entirely by themselves. We think that is better both for the colored girl and the white girl. We are trying the system of honors and working for privileges. Our Catholic girls go to Mass every Sunday morning, and the Sisters come to give them instruction. The Jewish girls go to the synagogue on Saturday, and have their own Sunday. We want each girl to be true to her own religion. In the country we cannot do those things. We go to the park once a week and try to have a very happy life, and to take advantage of all there is in the neighborhood. When we are in the country we will have to have more outdoor sports and games.

A new girl begins in the laundry, and from there through the plain sewing department, and some in the dressmaking department, and we want every girl to know something about being a home-maker. Most of the girls have come from the factories and mills, and many of them have worked there since they were eleven or twelve years old. Some of them are very low grade, mentally, and ought to have custodial care. They can be made self-supporting. They are usually good natured, but they cannot be self-directing. They ought to have custodial care past the child-bearing period of their lives.

There is no place to keep them. It is a very poor way for the State of Pennsylvania to do with its feeble-minded girls and women. When they leave us we have a visitor who tries to keep track of them. We let fewer and fewer of them go home, because they generally come from broken homes. It is useless to send a girl back to that same community and to the same old companions waiting to drag her down. We try to get her started in another locality, usually as a mother's helper.

If we don't provide pleasures for the girls they will provide them themselves. I would be glad to have you visit Darlington, although it is very crude at this time. We hope to have a well-equipped school there. I thank you.

Applause.

Mr. Colborn:—We have been so highly entertained at this session that I feel we ought to quit now and take these matters home and think of what has been said.

I want to say here, that as one of the members of the Program Committee I asked all of our State officers to be present with us. One or two of them replied that it was impossible to be here; some of them didn't answer at all. I took the liberty of writing to our noble, wise and just President, the Honorable Theodore Roosevelt, to be with us or to contribute a paper. He immediately answered my letter and said he had been away on his vacation and on his return found so many matters awaiting him that it was impossible for him to be with us, although he wished us God speed in the work we were doing, and he took from his message to Congress last year what he has said in regard to child and women labor, and he said, "If this will aid you or give you any suggestions I send it to you with my prayer." The President of the United States, who is as busy as any man in the world, could take time to write a letter to this Association, while our own authorities could not visit us, although if they were asked to go to the other end of the State to talk on good roads they would be there.

Applause.

Mr. H. W. Ochse, Chairman of the Committee, here presented the following report of the Auditing Committee:

TREASURER'S ACCOUNT.

Balance in Treasurer's hands, October 14, 1908	109 55

We, the undersigned Committee, appointed to audit the account of the Treasurer and fix the amount of the assessment for the ensuing year, respectfully report, that we have performed our duties, and find the account of the Treasurer correct and true as stated, and that there remains a balance in the hands of the Treasurer of $109.55, and no indebtedness. We feel that this Association is to be congratulated on the fine showing of its finances. The amounts expended have been economically and wisely expended.

We would recommend that the same assessments be levied the ensuing year as was for the past.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

H. W. OCHSE,
PHILIP HERTZOG,
Auditing Committee.

West Chester, October 14, 1908.

Upon motion the report is adopted, and ordered printed in the record.

Col. E. P. Gould (Erie), moved that the reports of the convention be sent out by express free prepaid to the different delegates. The motion was agreed to.

Colonel Gould, Chairman of the Committee on the resolution of Dr. Philips to be presented to the Legislative Committee, submitted the following report, as a recommendation for an amendment to the Compulsory Educational Law:

The Legislative Committee reports the following amendments to the Compulsory Attendance Act, as suggested by the resolution offered by Prof. G. M. Philips:

Whenever the attendance officer or other proper school authority shall report that any child between the ages of eight and sixteen years is unable to attend school as required by this act on account of lack of necessary clothing or food, or because such child's labor is necessary to the support of its family, the Board of School Directors, or its delegated representative, shall promptly report such case to any suitable relief agency operating in the school district, or if there be no such suitable relief agency to which the case can be referred, shall report it to the proper directors or overseers of the poor for investigation and proper relief, whose duty it shall be to render the necessary aid.

Upon motion of Mr. Colborn the report was received and ordered to be printed in the proceedings.

Mr. Ochse:—They state there that the proper authorities shall furnish necessary aid upon the complaint of the representative. I suppose that means the truant officer. There is hardly a day in the week that the truant officer doesn't send to me for shoes for some one who is going to school. In my town I know of men who are lying around and doing nothing that I am supporting their families, but the truant officer will not try to get work for the father, but he sends to me for shoes.

Col. Gould:—I think you do not understand the report. It says when such complaint is made by an authorized person it shall be referred to some organization in the community to investigate, or, if there is no such organization then to the Directors of the Poor to investigate, and if after investigation it is found necessary to do this they have the authority to do it; it is not compulsory.

Mrs. H. S. Rankin (Fayette):—Our Directors are scattered. That child would be kept out of school for some time. The truant officer comes and calls attention to it. I think in those cases they should be acted on at the time. We generally act on it in the Children's Aid Society, when we know it is necessary.

The motion in relation to the resolution offered by Colonel Gould was again voted upon and unanimously carried.

Upon motion of Colonel Gould the Convention here adjourned until 7.30 o'clock in the evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention was called to order by President Smith, as per adjournment.

An orchestra from the High School of West Chester gave some pleasant music.

Devotional exercises were conducted by Rev. Edward C. Griffith.

Dr. Frank Woodbury, Secretary of the Commission of Lunacy, here read the following interesting paper, which was received with applause:

COUNTY CARE OF THE HARMLESS INSANE BENEFICIAL TO PATIENT AND ECONOMICAL TO STATE.

Dr. Frank Woodbury, of Philadelphia, Secretary to Commission on Lunacy of State Board of Public Charities, opened the discussion by invitation.

I think that we can all agree upon one proposition—that the insane must be cared for. That statement will not be questioned. The next proposition that they shall be treated humanely, likewise will not be disputed by this audience. The question of how they shall be cared for, however, cannot be so easily passed over. With the class who have rich relatives to provide for them, we need not concern ourselves at present. The private hospitals of Pennsylvania are well equipped and can take good care of the rich insane. But when we come to the indigent insane, we are confronted not by a theory, but by a condition that demands serious consideration; a social problem that cries loudly for solution. At the present time, supplementing the large State Hospitals, by the county care method, in my opinion, offers the only practical solution to this problem. It not only treats the insane patient humanely, but also treats the taxpayer humanely by reducing the cost of maintenance by a considerable amount from that prevailing in the large State hospitals Right here, I will make the observation that whether the indigent insane are cared for in the large State hospitals or in the small county institutions, they must in the end be supported by the taxpayer. As a class they can never be made self-supporting, or only to a moderate degree. Under good management and favorable conditions, I am of the opinion, however that their labor could be utilized more profitably in smaller institutions of 200 to 250 inmates, especially in a farming or dairying region, than in the great hospitals where several thousands are congregated together.

A petition was presented to the Provincial Assembly of Pennsylvania on January 23, 1751, praying that public provision be made for the care of "persons distempered in mind and deprived of their rational faculties," in consequence of which a grant was made and the Pennsylvania Hospital was instituted, thus publicly recognizing the claims of the insane to humane care and treatment. In 1744, the Pennsylvania Legislature appointed a special committee to hear a report made by Dorothea L. Dix upon the condition of the insane in the poor houses and jails of this State. As a result the Harrisburg State Lunatic Asylum was opened in 1845. Since that time State Hospitals at Dixmont, Danville, Norristown, Warren and Wernersville have been opened.

I have quoted these two historical occurrences with which all of you are familiar, in order to demonstrate or emphasize the fact that the people of Pennsylvania are on record as recognizing, first, the claims of the indigent insane to humane treatment; and, second, the duty of the public authorities to make proper provision for them.

In 1883, the Lunacy Law was passed creating the Committee on Lunacy of the State Board of Charities of Pennsylvania. For twenty-five years this committee, as is shown by its annual reports, has safeguarded the interests of the insane, and has studied the problems of economic administration. A little more than ten years ago finding that the Legislature would not, or could not, appropriate enough funds to construct the new buildings demanded by the growing numbers of the insane, the Committee sought for some other means for relief. Finding that Wisconsin had been in the same predicament sixteen years previously, and had been successful in solving the problem, the Committee examined the method of so-called county care and was so well satisfied with the result, that at its suggestion, a law was passed in 1897, making the system operative in Pennsylvania. The principles of county care are easily understood and may be briefly stated. It contemplates removing a considerable number of the mild, harmless insane from the State institutions, thereby relieving overcrowding, and having them cared for in County Homes of less expensive construction, usually in connection with almshouses. In a few words the Wisconsin plan contemplated:

1. The removal of all chronics who are not ill, feeble, violent nor dangerous, from the State hospitals.
2. Encouraging and inducing a sufficient number of counties to construct each a local asylum for its chronic working insane, by the offer of $1.50 per week, paid by the State treasury to the county for each patient so maintained.
3. The gathering into the relieved State hospitals and newly constructed county asylums of all the insane persons kept in poor houses, in jails, thus bringing the entire number under proper treatment and humane care.

4. Establishing these asylums upon an industrial basis so that each chronic patient, able to be employed, should contribute his labor towards the cost of his support primarily to promote his health, contentment and well being; secondarily, as a proper economy; and, finally—

5. The assembling of classified chronic, harmless insane in small asylum communities, near to their former homes, friends and relatives, who would exercise a general supervision over them by frequently visiting them and would thus keep up their own interest in the afflicted.

In the twenty institutions in Pennsylvania now enjoying county care there were not less than 5648 patients reported at end of last year, September 30, 1907.

In the seven State hospitals, having a capacity in the aggregate of 6170, there are at present 8349 patients, or an excess of about 35 per cent. above their comfortable capacity.

Query—Where would we be now if we had not ten years ago introduced county care?

Just a word in conclusion as to the practical side of the question:

We have at present in the institutions, public and private, of this State, nearly 16,000 insane, nearly all indigent and nearly all chronic. The number of the insane gradually increases in this State. It has been observed that the annual growth is about 600, or enough to fill a good-sized hospital if one should be built each year. The question is "shall the people keep on building State hospitals that cost from say $1000 to $2000 per bed, or will they favor county care for the chronic insane at a cost say of $300 to $500 per bed?

The per capita cost for keeping patients in the State hospitals does not take into account the interest upon the investment, the enormous first cost, but the limit of expenditures fixed by the State is $4.25 per week for each indigent patient. The chronic insane can be kept in the county institutions at from $1.75 to $2.50 per week. At the Chester County Hospital at Embreeville, a model institution, the per capita cost for 238 patients is $2.73 per week.

Let us read a couple of paragraphs from a paper read by Mr. James E, Heg, before the National Conference of Charities, after sixteen years of experience with the county care method in Wisconsin:

"About 2700 of the chronic insane are cared for in twenty-three county insane asylums, and are fully as well cared for as in any State institution in the country. To have cared for these by the State would have required buildings that would have cost two millions of dollars. To have obtained that vast sum from the Legislature would have been almost impossible, and if possible, would have entailed heavy burdens upon the people."

For each indigent insane person cared for in county asylums the State pays the county $1.50 per week. If he had been sent to the State Hospital the county would be obliged to pay the hospital $1.75 per week. The county caring for its own insane therefore gets $3.25 per week is what it saves and receives. The average cost of keeping the chronic insane being about $1.75 per week, making a gain of $1.50 per week for each inmate. In addition the patients are able to work on the farm or about the house, and many of them earn the whole amount of their maintenance in this way.

In Wisconsin Mr. Heg reports that the counties that have had asylums for ten or twelve years have paid for their entire permanent investment in land, buildings, improvements and repairs. In other words, the people have paid no more than they otherwise would have had to pay for the care of these insane in State institutions, yet have been able to save enough in twelve years to pay for their entire investment in handsome buildings large farms, barn and the like.

He inquires, "As a matter of economy, could any better showing be made than this?"

Following the reading of this paper the Girls' Chorus of the High School favored the Convention with some pleasing songs, which were received with applause.

President Smith here introduced Hon. Isaac Johnson, member of Commission of Lunacy, and Judge of Delaware county, who was received with applause, and addressed the Convention as follows:

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen:

I can add but little to what Dr. Woodbury has said about county care of the insane in Pennsylvania. I may say, however, that while the State Board of Charities and the Committee of Lunacy of the State regard county care as a success every one in the State doesn't take that view of it. After ten years of experience and observation I want to bear testimony to the fact that I consider it a great success. As has been said by Dr. Woodbury, the insane must be cared for, that is beyond the realm of discussion. How to do it best for them and for the State is a very interesting question. Indeed there are few questions presented to us to-day, economically, that are given more importance than the care of the dependent; not only the insane, but the idiotic, are increasing with great rapidity, and in the near future we shall be confronted with it as a great practical question, for not only do they increase as population increases, but as the interests of the people increase, as the kindly Christian sentiment grows, as it does in our civilization, we extend it more in proportion, year by year. We are to be confronted in the near future with the problem of caring for the dependent, and I am glad to come to West Chester to-night, not to make a speech, but to look into the faces of the people who are interested in these matters, and to meet with the Directors of the Poor of Pennsylvania.

In the hands of these men are the care of the poor and of the indigent insane. Two classes absolutely unable to help themselves, unable to complain of the wrongs that may be shown them, unable to protest, and in your hands is the destiny of these people. Of no class is it so important to have proper care as the insane. The poor can speak, but one where reason swings loose from its moorings, where the machine will not work, or if it works work wrong, and where their liberty and life are in the hands of somebody else, it is important that those who have charge of such be men of character, probity, honor, honesty, and no body of men ought to be selected with greater care.

The great hospitals of the State (and I do not speak unkindly of them, or of their management, because I regard them as the equals of any hospitals in the nation, and the management of them as second to none), Drs. Richardson and Wolf, at Norristown; Hill, at Wernersville, and the physicians at Wilkes-Barre and Warren and Dixmont, and in the institutions in Philadelphia, and in Chester county, they are the equals in skill of any to be found in the nation (Applause). The object in creating county care, and in this Act, was not because there was any lack of confidence in the ability and skill of those in charge of the great institutions, but there is a reason why county care is a success and a reason why it should be more successful in the future. As you have been told, we borrowed it from Wisconsin. I don't say anything against the Legislature. I don't think there has been an appeal made to them in the matter of the care of the insane that they have not promptly responded to. Our mistake in the past, and which we hope to remedy in the future, is that we haven't gone to the Legislature in a proper spirit and with the proper faith. We have allowed the different institutions to go to the Legislature and make their appeals. Of course Wernersville doesn't know anything about the needs of Norristown, and Warren cared nothing for Dixmont; and they appealed in favor of their own institutions, and there was no combined effort.

The Board of Public Charities have resolved to adopt a different rule, and to ask for these appropriations for all the State and we know that no proper appeal to the Legislature will fail of response.

But for county care: It is a success; because the caring for these people at home, among their friends, in smaller numbers than they can be cared for in the great hospitals, must be an advantage—financially—not a very high ground to put it on, but we must meet the question financially also. It has been shown to be the cheapest method. But there is another reason, and a very good one; and in these comparisons I make it is not intended to be a reflection on the management of the State hospitals. In the State hospitals, in 1906, only 2.87 per cent.. were discharged as cured, while under county care 7 per cent. Restored improved in the State hospitals, 2.64 per cent. and about 9.50 per cent. in the hospitals under county care, almost three times as great a percentage.

It is part of our business to complain. The Board of Public Charities has been doing that ever since I was with it. It does good, sometimes. It has been said that the care in the county-care hospitals isn't up to the care in the State hospitals. I wouldn't be surprised if that were true, in a sense, because in the smaller hospitals there is not the opportunity to employ the highest medical skill and care. But the higher degree of care doesn't show itself in the percentage restored or in the percentage discharged as cured, and there is a reason for it. In the big hospitals they do the very best they can. They cannot give them the individual care and the kind of treatment calculated to restore them as they can in the home hospital, and, besides, the home hospital is home rule; protective tariff, so, you see, I am a Republican. And, outside of that, on the ground of humanity it commends itself to every one. Take Dixmont, for instance, away out on the Ohio river below Pittsburg. Some of the homes of the inmates are hundreds of miles from there. Their friends cannot visit them. Their friends are generally poor. If you go to Dixmont there is no place to stay over night. You can hardly get there without a balloon. I don't know what effect it has on these poor people to have their friends visit them, and pour a little ray of sunshine into their lives, but I think it has a great deal to do with their improvement, certainly with their happiness. In the county homes they can be visited. I presume there are eight or nine thousand people in the big hospitals, leaving out Philadelphia, and I presume there are two-thirds of them that their friends are unable to visit them.

Besides this there is another reason, and that is an economic reason; they will always be maintained cheaper in county-care hospitals than in the large hospitals.

And there is another reason: it makes a home market for the people, which is of great importance to every county. It helps the farmer and the gardener to have these county hospitals. And, again, it arouses some home feeling towards these institutions. Cart a man from down the Maryland line over to Dixmont and they lose sight of him at home, you might as well bury him.

There is no public sentiment in favor of the great institution that is to care for them.

In the future, we must care for twenty-five or thirty thousand of these people.

Now, it is absolutely impossible to care for them under the old institutional system, in my opinion. Everybody on the Board of Public Charities doesn't agree with me. But we do agree, because it is before us continually, that the present method is not a good one. If we are going to abandon county care and not extend it to the other counties of the State the Legislature must provide for a new institution every time it meets, to take care of the insane, because every two years there is an increase of a thousand, and every one of the large institutions are crowded to-day and overcrowded.

Therefore it gives me pleasure to come before you and say a good word for county care, and to ask that your Directors shall use every effort to extend it to every county in the State, believing that it will be for the best interests of these poor unfortunates whom we must care for. It is a public, and State and national duty that no civilized community seeks to escape. We need the big institutions to care for the acute insane. I hope you will all take this matter up and look at it, in the interest of these poor unfortunates and in the interest of the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. I thank you.

Applause.

The Girls' Chorus of the High School sang, "Annie Laurie," very sweetly and were greeted with hearty applause.

President Smith here introduced Mrs. Frederick Schoff, President of Probation and Juvenile Court Association, who read the following very interesting paper, which was received with hearty applause.

THE PLACE AND WORK OF THE JUVENILE COURT AND PROBATION SYSTEM.

By Mrs. Frederic Schoff, President of Philadelphia Juvenile Court and Probation Association, Chartered.

The first Juvenile Court established by Legislative enactment was opened in Chicago in April, 1899. Whatever effort was made to separate children from adult criminals before that was purely voluntary on the part of the sitting Judge.

Massachusetts had used probation by legislative enactment for many years, but its benefit was rarely extended to children, and the fact that there were but two or three probation officers in Boston for all the adults as well as children made the system one of parole rather than probation which for children is rarely effective.

A small group of men and women in Chicago had become deeply interested in the evolution of a system which would remove children from the influences and associations of the prison and the criminal court and which would give to each child individual, careful consideration.

Hon. Harvey B. Hurd, an able lawyer, a wise statesman, a father and grandfather, in 1899, drafted the now famous Juvenile Court Acts of Illinois. Judge Hurd gave the ripe experience of a remarkable life to planning this system of dealing with children. Familiar as he was with the courts and the children who came into them, he felt that the method of procedure made criminals. To make things better for the children before he dies was his earnest wish, and in his enthusiasm over it, he gave days and weeks of his time in explaining its workings as in his plan he wished to see it carried out. Judge Hurd was wonderfully adapted for making an adequate system for the State to use in guarding the interests of childhood. He understood children. He loved and knew them as few men do. Children and grandchildren had given him experience. He also knew the unfortunate children who were caught in the drag net of the police, and day after day were imbibing the poison of criminal courts and prisons.

To know children, to know conditions affecting them seriously, to know legal requirements and to have the earnest purpose to better children's opportunities was the combination of qualities which brought into practical realization the earnest desires of many lovers of the children, and which was to revolutionize the methods of centuries. 1899 saw the first Juvenile Court in Chicago, 1901, the Juvenile Court and probation laws were passed in Wisconsin, Pennsylvania and Kansas. 1902 gave Maryland the system. 1903 six States passed acts establishing it. 1904 two more adopted it. 1905 eight others passed Juvenile Court and probation laws. In 1906 two others secured this legislation. In 1907 Great Britain passed laws modelled after those in use here. Canada has just adopted the system by Parliamentary enactment. Sweden, Norway, Germany Austria-Hungary, France and Italy have all sent their representatives to America to study the system, and as rapidly as possible they are modelling laws after those in use here.

In 1899 a little eight-year old girl in Philadelphia set fire to a house "to see the fire burn and the engines run," she said. She was tried in the criminal court awaiting her turn among every sort of criminal. Newspapers gave an entire page to this "Prodigy of Crime" as great head lines under the picture described her.

Motherless since she was two years old, taught to steal by the caretaker provided by her father, whipped when she would not do it, an inmate of an orphan's home, a drudge in a city boarding house, what had there been in all her life to give her any true ideal of life. The Judge reluctantly committed her to a reformatory, where necessarily girls who knew more of evil than she would be her companions.

I did not know the child, but I did know well what I would want done for my dear child, if I had left her motherless, and I determined to save that little girl if possible. That was the beginning of the work for Juvenile Courts and probation in Pennsylvania.

The Judge revealed to me a condition that in my protected life I had never dreamed of. He said, "I had no choice in the matter; I had no other place to send her, and they do not want her there." With an inward vow never to rest until Pennsylvania had other alternatives and other methods of treating its little children I began a study of conditions in Pennsylvania and elsewhere.

First, however, the Judge gave the child to Mrs. Wm. T. Carter, whom I had interested to take her. The so-called prodigy of crime has been a teacher for two years, and ambitious to rise, is now in a normal school. She has taken prizes for Bible study, and is a respected, useful member of society.

This result can be secured in most cases with the same careful, wise, loving care that little Annie has had.

What was the condition in Pennsylvania then? In Philadelphia there were five hundred children, from six to sixteen in the county prison in one year. Children were held as witnesses and had remained two months in custody. Three hundred children a month were passing through the station houses of Philadelphia for offenses of a more or less serious nature, yet there was no one to care, and no one to help them do better. The Courts could not help them however much they might desire it. The children were left uncared for, until it became necessary to send them to a reformatory.

The sixty-nine counties of Pennsylvania each had its jail, and in every one children were sentenced and subjected to the vile association with criminals of every sort. Eight hundred churches in Philadelphia, thousands of good homes, but utterly oblivious to the little ones who so sadly needed help. In pursuance of information as to what was being done for children throughout the United States, and in order to secure the best system, I organized a committee of women, for Pennsylvania, and months were spent in studying the statutes of every State concerning children. This compilation of the Statutes was published by the New Century Club and has since been used by the Commissioner of Education in Harvard and Yale, and has served a purpose in showing how meagre child protection was in nearly all States at that time.. Illinois, Michigan and Massachusetts were then in the lead, and in my travels of investigation I met Judge Hurd, and in the new Juvenile Court and Probation Act of Chicago I recognized the wonderful opportunities for children and the foundation of better methods of protecting and helping them.

It was a group of earnest experienced mothers who had the Juvenile Court and Probation Acts of Pennsylvania drafted in 1900 and also the act providing rooms or buildings separate from the jail for children awaiting hearing.

The Legislature of Pennsylvania listened to the pleas of mothers in behalf of the children, and in June, 1901, Pennsylvania opened its Juvenile Court in Philadelphia, the second Juvenile Court in the United States established by legislative enactment. The probation officers were provided by the efforts of the women who had taken the initiative in securing the laws and from June, 1901, until to-day an efficient, faithful corps of probation officers has been provided by the group of mothers who with added numbers from the Philadelphia Juvenile Court and Probation Associations which is chartered by the Courts.

The first Juvenile Court Act was declared unconstitutional in 1903, but even before the Superior Court so decided, new acts were drawn and presented to the Legislature. The decision of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania was the first Supreme Court decision sustaining the validity of this system of dealing with children. No indictment, no jury, no plea of guilty or not guilty, but an enquiry into what the welfare of the child and the State demand. No prisons any more for children, no lonely sad little ones without a friend to counsel or aid, but a good woman ready with help and care, before the habits are fixed.

Quietly and with no realization of the vast import of its acts the Legislature reversed the methods of centuries and inaugurated a new era for helpless childhood.

From June, 1901, up to the present time every child held for the Juvenile Court and thousands who were merely arrested and not held have had consideration and care by the Juvenile Court Association and its probation officers. Medical and surgical examinations have been made when necessary. Homes have been helped, parents made to realize their duty and responsibility, and a complete, accurate record has been kept of all the cases from that date to this. Churches have been enlisted in the movement, and every agency used to help the children.

Nine years of work with a single purpose, viz.: To give to Pennsylvania the best system possible for caring for the dependent, neglected and erring children through legislative enactments and co-operation with courts in carrying them out, has shown great progress, but there are still important points to be covered and we desire your help in completing the system which year by year the Legislature has aided us in building.

Pittsburg and Philadelphia Juvenile Court Associations are co-operating in plans for the completion of the Juvenile Court system. Mr. Alexander Simpson, Jr., Chairman of the Law Reform Committee of the Bar Association, has made it his only work during the summer to study the needs and draft acts to strengthen the parts which need rounding out for the systematic, harmonious working of the entire system.

Judge Beitler, President Smith, of the Pittsburg Bar, have conferred with Mr. Simpson, and many counties in Pennsylvania have been interested to co-operate in a movement which will give the benefit of the system to every county and which will put Pennsylvania in the lead in its system of court and probation work.

Legislatures, which for years have been inert regarding laws for child protection, have enacted more statutes in the last nine years than in a quarter of a century before.

The conscience of the people has been aroused. Their eyes have been opened to the injustice that has been done to helpless, erring little ones, and not only in America but in Europe the leaven is working and old methods are being replaced by others whose purpose is to consider what is best for each child rather than to mete out punishment in accordance with a criminal code that may have been suitable a thousand years ago, but which has long outlived its usefulness for to-day.

In the Juvenile Court the child who steals, the truant, the runaway, and the vagrant child are considered as children needing treatment. It is more important to prevent continuance in wrong doing than to punish. It is necessary to consider children individually rather than en masse. Punishment that does not reason from cause to effect usually avails nothing. Before the Juvenile Court and Probation Laws were established what did we have? Children in every Criminal Court. Children in every prison.

No one to help them, no one to treat them differently from the crime-hardened adult. They entered the mill which grinds out criminals, and it was next to impossible ever to escape the meshes which entangle these who once sin against the laws.

The child, usually already handicapped by bad influences and environment, by his trial and imprisonment, met obstacles that few could surmount in the way of a good life. Hardened and embittered against society, his life was turned to evil.

The Juvenile Court is the State's guarantee that every child shall be given a chance to become a good citizen, that at the time when he is unable to guide his own life, when ignorant weak parents have failed, when perhaps criminal parents are guiding him into crime, when orphanage and poverty or neglect have sent him adrift, a waif with no one to whom he is responsible, the State may have the authority to consider his future welfare, which is equally the welfare of the State, and provide therefor.

The Juvenile Court is the hospital for treatment of moral disease. The probation officers are the nurses.

The recovery of the patient will depend much on the efficiency of the diagnosis of each case, and on the treatment it receives.

The Juvenile Court has been the means of revealing conditions which no one realized. I have taken the report for one week in a large city as typical of the vast work that lies before those who would help these blameless, though erring children.

There were 197 children arrested; 197 children under sixteen; 74 of these were for larceny; 45 as runaways; 40 for incorrigibility. Vagrancy, assault and malicious mischief were the causes of arrest for the rest. One hundred and eighty-two were boys, 15 girls; 75 were Americans; 20 were between eight and ten; 63 were between 10 and 13 years, and 114 were between 13 and 16 years.

This week was less than the average in numbers, yet you will see that would bring up the yearly number of arrests of juveniles in a year to over ten thousand.

These are the children who are standing at the parting of the ways. These are the little ones who may be saved if they meet at this time a loving, wise friend who will guide them and mother them, but who, before the Juvenile Court was established, were either neglected or sent to reformatories.

The hospital which had but one remedy for every disease would in these days be considered as absurd. The Juvenile Court which does not recognize the individuality of each case, which does not study the home, the conditions and the motives which have led to the offense, and which does not have at its hand a variety of agencies to help the children may be compared to the hospital with a single remedy.

It might cure a few, but it would kill the many. That is what the methods of the past have done. That is why crime has increased. That is why our prisons are full. The widespread idea that we must accept the situation, that crime and prisons are a necessity, that there is a criminal class made of different clay from the rest of humanity has kept away the good men and women without whose help these erring brothers and sisters of ours will never be saved.

The Juvenile Court without its corps of probation officers who are guarded by a loving insight into child nature and who also have the ability to inspire in the child true standards of right living is almost useless. It is the hospital without any nurses, and everyone knows that in illness good nursing is more than medicine.

The success of the Juvenile Court depends far more on the quality of the probation officers than on the Judge, for while he has the opportunity to impress the child for the few minutes he is before him, real success in character building comes only in the old way. It is line upon line, precept upon precept and over it all must brood the spirit of love without which no child is helped.

Probation work is character building, nothing more, nothing less. It is joining hands with God to lead His little ones to His fold.

The duty of a probation officer is not only to the child. It extends to helping the parents. Good housekeeping, better home-making in its best sense must be understood by a good probation officer. Often it is ignorance of these things that is the cause of the trouble. No better training can be given than what is given to kindergarten teachers, which dwells especially upon the study of the child and his needs and development.

Study of charity work and college training are required in some schools of philanthropy while the vital and essential qualification, study of child development, is left out.

One may be thoroughly versed in every form of charity, and have the highest college degree, and yet be a very poor probation officer. There are some individuals whose faith in human nature brings out the best in those whom they have under their care. They have a heart to sympathize and a spirit consecrated to the service of uplifting childhood. The more difficult the case the greater is their interest in it. Patience, love, common sense, dignity and experience of life are essential to one who is to guide children.

No children are hopeless. In the heart of each one is enfolded the germ of goodness which may be quickened and grow to eternity, but which is often crushed by those who do not understand the delicate, sensitive nature of an immortal soul.

The Juvenile Court gives the opportunity never before afforded to study the needs of children. Under the old system no separate account was taken of Juvenile crime. It was but part of the criminal record which includes all of every age who violate our laws. The sole duty of the Court was to carry out the law to punishment.

Less than ten years' experience in the Juvenile Court and probation work has proved that in nearly all cases the children's presence there is due to conditions over which they have no control, which have been made by the community in which they live, which can be changed, and which will be changed as a result of the new light that has come to those who all over this country are coming in touch with the beginning of crime.

It has dawned on many that to punish children for crimes which are the direct result of the conditions of their lives is about as sensible as to put a healthy child into a small-pox hospital and then punish him because he contracted the disease.

The Juvenile Court treats juvenile crimes, and already like the physicians who stand highest in their work for humanity, movements are everywhere being inaugurated to prevent the necessity of bringing children into Court.

If it is the condition of their lives which bring them there, every true friend of childhood will bend her energies to removing these conditions.

The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania has put itself on record as sustaining the Juvenile Court, and as considering it for protection and guardianship, and in no sense a criminal court. The decision states that, "As the welfare of the State requires that children should be guarded from association and contact with crime and criminals, and as those who, from want of proper parental care or guardianship, may become liable to penalties which ought not to be imposed upon them, it is important that the powers of the Court, in respect to the care, treatment and control of dependent, neglected, delinquent and incorrigible children should be clearly distinguished from those exercised by it in the administration of the criminal law. After defining the powers of the Court the Act proceeds to direct how they are to be exercised in giving effect to its purpose.

"It is not for the punishment of offenders, but for the salvation of children, and points out the way by which the State undertakes to save, not particular children of a special class, but all children under a certain age, whose salvation may become the duty of the State in the absence of proper parental care or disregard of it by wayward children. No child under the age of sixteen years is excluded from its beneficent provisions. Its protecting arm is for all who have not attained that age and who may need its protection. It is for all children for the same class. That minors may be classified for their best interests and the public welfare, has never been questioned in the legislation relating to them.

"With its jurisdiction unrestricted by the constitution, it is for the Legislature to declare what shall be exercised by it as a general police court, and instead of creating a distinctively new court, the Act of 1903 does nothing more than confer additional powers upon the old court and clearly define them. On this point nothing can be profitably added to the following from the opinion of the Superior Court: 'No new court is created and the ancient Court of Quarter Sessions, which is older than all the Constitutions of Pennsylvania, is given thereby not greater but different powers from those previously exercised.' It is a mere convenient designation of the Court of Quarter Sessions to call it, when caring for children, a juvenile court, but no such Court, as an independent tribunal, is created. It is still the Court of Quarter Sessions before which the proceedings are conducted, and though that Court in so conducting them, is to be known as the Juvenile Court, the records are still those of the Court of Quarter Sessions. To save a child from becoming a criminal, or from continuing in a career of crime, to end in maturer years in public punishment and disgrace, the Legislature surely may provide for the salvation of such a child, if its parents or guardian be unable or unwilling to do so, by bringing it into one of the Courts of the State without any process at all, for the purpose of subjecting it to the State's guardianship and protection. The natural parent needs no process to temporarily deprive his child of its liberty by confining it in his own home, to save it and to shield it from the consequences of persistence in a career of waywardness, nor is the State, when compelled, as parents partiae, to take the place of the father for the same purpose, required to adopt any process as a means of placing its hands upon the child to lead it into one of its Courts

"When the child gets there and the Court, with the power to save it determines on its salvation, and not its punishment, it is immaterial how it got there. The Act simply provides how children who ought to be saved may reach the Court to be saved. If experience should show that there ought to be other ways for it to get there, the Legislature can, and undoubtedly will, adopt them, and they will never be regarded as undue processes for depriving a child of its liberty or property as a penalty for crime committed. As already stated, the Act is not for the trial of a child charged with a crime, but is mercifully to save it from such an ordeal, with the prison or penitentiary in its wake, if the child's own good and the best interests of the State justify such salvation. Whether the child deserves to be saved by the State is no more a question for a jury than whether the father, if able to save it, ought to save it. If the latter ought to save, but is powerless to do so, the former, by the Act of 1903, undertakes the duty, and the Legislature, in directing how that duty is to be performed in a proper case, denies the child no right of a trial by a jury, for the simple reason that, by the act, it is not to be tried for anything. The Court passes upon nothing but the propriety of an effort to save it; and if a worthy subject for an effort of salvation, that effort is made in the way directed by the Act. The Act is but an exercise by the State of its supreme power over the welfare of its children, a power under which it can take a child from its father, and let it go where it will without committing it to any guardianship or any institution, if the welfare of the child, taking its age into consideration, can be thus best promoted. The true rule is: 'That the Courts are to judge upon the circumstances of the particular case, and to give their directions accordingly.'

"There is no restraint upon the natural liberty of children contemplated by such a law, none whatever; but rather the placing of them under the natural restraint, as far as practicable, that should be, but is not, exercised by parental authority. It is the mere conferring upon them that protection to which, under the circumstances, they are entitled as a matter of right. It is for their welfare and that of the community at large. The design is not punishment, nor the restraint imprisonment, any more than is the wholesome restraint which a parent exercises over his child. The severity in either case must necessarily be tempered to meet the necessities of the particular situation. There is no probability in the proper administration of the law, of the child's liberty being unduly invaded. Every statute which is designed to give protection, care and training to children, as a needed substitute for parental authority and performance of parental duty, is but a recognition of the duty of the State, as the legitimate guardian and protector of children when other guardianship fails. No constitutional right is violated, but one of the most important duties which organized society owes to its helpless members is performed just in the measure that the law is framed with wisdom and is carefully administered.

"None of the objections urged against the Constitutionality of the Act can prevail. The assignments of error are, therefore, all overruled and the order of the Superior Court, affirming the commitment below, is affirmed."

What, then, are its duties and what should it do for the children?

It deals with the care, treatment and control of dependent, neglected, delinquent and incorrigible children. What is its duty to the dependent children? No one dreams of transferring houses or land from one to another without a record, and these records can be traced to the first settlement of the country. How much more important children are than houses or land, yet no record or report is required in Pennsylvania of such placing of children. Any agency responsible or otherwise can put children wherever it pleases them, and there is no one to question. Many families have been separated and have lost sight of each other through this careless method.

Many children have been placed in unsuitable homes. Justice and protection of helpless children can only be ensured by having every child placed with approval of the County Court and with accurate record of such placement and of any change made later. Annual reports should be made of children so placed. Records of this kind are of the utmost importance and the Court's approval would prevent much careless placing of children.

In large cities the appropriations for this work are utterly inadequate and with the duty given often to one man, without providing proper assistance it is impossible to do the placing as it should be done.

The neglected children should be brought into Court on petition. The parents should be obliged to explain their neglect, and the State should exercise its authority in using whatever means are necessary to give neglected children a fair square chance. Probation for parents is required in such cases and needed in many cases of childish misdemeanors, this is true.

The delinquent child is one who commits offenses which would be regarded as crimes in older persons. The Court's duty is to consider in each case what will best prevent the recurrence of the offense, and as each case must be considered on its individual merits no law can be made. Common sense, sympathy and insight into causes will go far toward a wise solution.

Finally the Court deals with the so-called incorrigible child. Many of these are so named from the desire of parents to let the State support their children. Many are children of incorrigible parents. The Court must exercise wisdom in deciding this, and through the law requiring committments to be made only through the Juvenile Court no child can now be sent from his home and made an expense to the State without thorough investigation and with due consideration of the child's side as well as the parents' side of the case.

Children who are habitual truants can be brought into Court and placed on probation. Children who work should have their certificates from the Juvenile Court. The Juvenile Court of each county should have a record of dependent children, and where placed, of neglected children, of delinquent and incorrigible and also of the working children.

The Juvenile Court should have power to punish those who cause children to commit crimes. A bill providing for this has been twice passed by the Legislature and twice vetoed. It is on the statutes of many other States and after conference with the Governor and Attorney General it is our hope that this defect in the Juvenile Court work may be remedied.

The decisions rendered by the Superior and Supreme Courts of Pennsylvania in sustaining the constitutionality of the Juvenile Court Acts are of the utmost importance in showing that the State has not only the power but the duty to protect its child citizens.

It clearly stated that the Juvenile Court is not a criminal Court, but a Court for the protection and guardianship of such children as require its protection. No new Court is created nor is a special Judge needed to ensure this.

The system of rotation in Pennsylvania was adopted after unfortunate experience with the other methods, and there is no reason why it is not just as advantageous in dealing with children as with other important matters which come under Court jurisdiction.

No county needs a special Judge for the Juvenile Court if the probation system is well organized.

The Judge holds a purely judicial position. He sits to listen to testimony in the hearing, and to give his judgment as to what is best for the child and the State. He may give good advice and kindly admonition, but there his duty ends. Probation is the right arm of the Court but distinct in its duties. Probation is not a function of the judiciary nor can our busy Judges be expected to supervise or have the responsibility for the probation work, which is in the highest sense good mothering of children who need it. We have admired the work of Judge Lindsey and some others who have thrown themselves into the children's work with all their heart, but this would not be practical or possible in most instances. It would be utterly impracticable, unnecessary, and too expensive in Pennsylvania to have a special Judge in every county for children and to do this would require a constitutional amendment. With thoroughly organized probation work, the Courts as constituted at present are fully able to do the work for children.

There should be a Probation Association in every county authorized by the Legislature and composed of men and women whose interest and love for children fits them for their duties, and who should receive no remuneration for their services.

There should be a State Probation Commission appointed by the Governor whose duty it should be to supervise the probation work of the whole State, and to which every county association should report. Each County Probation Association should choose the probation officers and direct their work, making what rules are necessary, advising with them concerning their cases, and co-operating with them in every way possible in the care of the children.

The Association should be required to dismiss any officer by request of the Court. It should require monthly reports from each officer and should make reports at least annually to the State Commission and to the Court.

The salaries of the Probation officers should be paid by each county on warrant of the Probation Association and should be fixed by those whose duty it is to fix the salaries of other county officers. This makes it possible for each county to regulate the expense for itself. The rooms or buildings provided for the children who must be held until the Court should be under the direction and management of the County Probation Association, and from the arrest of any child, this Association should be responsible for his care. The probation officer should have every right that counsel has in making investigation, attending preliminary hearings, and in examining the child. Such officers should have a clear, accurate knowledge of the whole case to present to the Judge at the hearing.

Wherever possible every child should have an opportunity to do better in his own home unless it is a criminal one. In that case the welfare of the child and State may demand permanent separation, and a real home should be found as soon as possible.

There should be a sufficient number of probation officers to give the frequent close companionship and visits that will have an influence on the child. Sympathetic tact, common sense, and a knowledge of child nature and home making are essential to a successful probation officer. Those who have had experience of life do better than those who are too young, but above all, the probation officer must love the work or it will not be a success.

The Juvenile Court gives the opportunity to help children at the first downward step when formerly trivial offenses were ignored until serious measures were necessary. The work is preventive and therefore takes cognizance of all that tends to tempt and lead children astray. The County Probation Association should enlist the sympathy and interest of the entire county in making conditions better for the children. It co-operates with the teachers, with the truant officers, with the police, with the Court. Its business is to consider the welfare of the children of the county. The children cannot be saved by the best of Judges or by a few probation officers unless they are supported and aided by good women and men of the community. Many agencies are needed to prevent our children from going astray. Under this system not one should escape. Each one should have the consideration which is impossible in a busy court room or by men who are the bread winners, and who have little time to give to the care of even their own children. Mothering in the home fits for mothering the children of the State who lack that, and good mothering means more than anything else in giving children true ideals of life and fitting them to be good men and women.

President Roosevelt has well said that "All questions of social life will solve themselves if our social and family relations are as they should be; if not, no material prosperity, no progress, in literature, art, success in business or victory in war will make up for it to the nation."

The Juvenile Court's great opportunity is to strengthen and improve the home. In the long run and finally, the home is the place for the child. Until the Juvenile Court and probation came into being there was no organized way of reaching weak, poor homes to benefit them. The only possibility was to take a child away for a time.

How much stronger the system which recognizes that a home and father and mother are better for children, and when homes need help to make them right to give it to them. This is one of the strongest and best possibilities of the Juvenile Court.

President Smith:—We have with us this evening one who has devoted much of his life to improving the condition of the unfortunate and those needing care, the General Superintendent of the Children's Home and Aid Society of Illinois, as well as Chairman of the Russell Sage Commission for the study of child-placing in the United States, Dr. H. H. Hart, of Chicago, who will give us a short address.

Dr. Hart was received with applause, and said:

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen:

Mr. Nibecker and I have agreed to divide the time, it being a late hour, and he has kindly consented to give me fifteen minutes and he will take ten.

I have just returned from the meetings of the State Conference of Charities of California and Washington. I have come to this gathering with a great deal of delight. I always feel at home when I am among county officers. For fifteen years I worked with them in Minnesota. I wish there was time to say a word about the county care of the insane.

Last spring I made an investigation in behalf of the State of Oklahoma. I visited some of the county insane asylums and there is no question as to the admirable quality of the work done in the State of Wisconsin. I made it a point to talk with the patients privately, and I think I found but one exception in all the patients I talked to. The patients said they preferred a county asylum to a State hospital. They say, "We know the Superintendent, and feel more at home here." The State of Wisconsin is the only State where the State hospitals are not overcrowded, and you can reach that point in this State. That is the object of the county system. It is a tremendously difficult thing to build a State institution. It takes five years to build it, but the county system is in a sense, automatic. You can add new provisions for the insane without any legislation whatever. I have a suggestion to make, which is original with me. Get your next Legislature, instead of making appropriation for a new State hospital to make an appropriation which shall be placed in the control of the State Board of Charities with authority to allow $25,000 to every new county hospital that is built until you shall have relieved the overcrowding in the State hospitals. This will provide a special inducement to the counties to build county asylums.

I know of nothing more dreadful than to see the patients spread so thickly on the floor of a State Hospital that you cannot walk over the floor without almost stepping on a patient. For the past six months I have been engaged on a special commission from the Russell Sage Foundation.

My plea is not for the bad or delinquent child. You have made advances in that line. You have in this State, at the head of your institution at Glen Mills, a man who stands second to none in the United States, Mr. F. H. Nibecker (Applause).

I am not giving taffy. I heard him make an address in Illinois some three years ago that was one of the most manly and eloquent pleas for the administration of institutions along right lines that I ever heard.

You have at the head of your House of Refuge for girls, in Philadelphia, a woman who was my assistant for six years; one of the strongest and most capable women I ever came in contact with. She is devoted to her work, and is doing great work in that institution (Applause).

In the Morganza institution the Board of Directors, I understand, are planning great advances in its administration to bring it to the highest plain. We have heard to-night one of the best papers I ever heard in regard to the Juvenile Court (Referring to the excellent paper of Mrs. Frederic Schoff).

I would like to ask how many people here have the impression that the Juvenile Court is for the most part for the child that has committed some fault? Now, how many have the impression that the duty of the Juvenile Court for the dependent child is as important as it is for the delinquent child? I want to say that the work of the Juvenile Court for the dependent child is at least of equal importance with its work for the delinquent child. The dependent child is not accused of anything. That is the child for whom I am to speak to-night.

When you work for this delinquent child your work is all done in two or three years, and he goes back into the community and the Court lets go of him. But the work for the dependent child is for his whole life. He ought to be under the care of the State until he reaches his majority. If you make a mistake in regard to your action for the dependent child that mistake is not discovered perhaps for twenty years. We had a child in the State of New York that recently won a suit that gave it over $100,000, and the question turned on the validity of the action of the Court, made some eight or ten years ago. The witnesses were dead or scattered; and I say that from a legal standpoint the work of the Juvenile Court in the care of the dependent child is at least equal in its importance to that for the delinquent child.

The most important sign of the times, in this field, is the tremendous growth of the public conscience in regard to our responsibility for the dependent and delinquent child. People are awakening to what it means. In Philadelphia two years ago there was a paper read by Mr. William H. Rear, the Assistant Superintendent of the Boston Children's Aid Society, "The Full Measure of Responsibility in Child-Helping Work." Everyone of you should read it. It is the most important contribution to the literature of child work that has been made in many years.

I printed some ten thousand copies and distributed them, and I am going to print it again.

That paper emphasizes what Mrs. Schoff has said to-night, the absolute necessity for a proper diagnosis. I remember the time when a man could take two courses of lectures and go out and practice medicine. Now it isn't much use for a young man to attempt to be a physician unless he has been through college and has had four years in a medical school. We don't allow a man to practice as a veterinary surgeon unless he has passed a State examination and proved his ability to practice. But until recently anyone was good enough to take up children's work. But we have awakened to the fact that we need the best that can be had in the community. People are awakening to the need of study of the case. We are getting the best people we can get, and the time will come when our probation officers will be even better than they are now, and will have time to deal properly with each case.

Now, as to the recognition of the need of watchful care and supervision of children after they are sent into family homes. The family home method is now recognized as the method. We are not going to build any more Girard Colleges. It is recognized that the family home can do most of the work necessary for the child. We must have temporary care and training for the dependent child, but it is recognized by every one that the work of the institution, for the healthy and normal child, is temporary, and educational, and that the family home can do most of the work.

There are wonderful things going on in Massachusetts along this line. I have a list of thirteen orphan asylums and children's homes closed in that State in the last twenty years. They are substituting the family home; but they have come to recognize that it is not merely economy to be considered: take care of them right, and spend what is necessary (Applause).

When you have sent a child out and put it into a home you have no right to abandon that child and take it for granted that he is going to receive proper care. There must be co-operation between the people who have placed that child out and the good people who have taken it. I want to leave that message with you.

My time is up. (Cries of go on.)

I have found counties in Pennsylvania where there was no list of children out in homes, under the charge of the county. I found one county where the Poor Directors go in a body, every year, to visit the children. The important thing is that some one should get next to that child, and get his confidence, and you can do it by the committee method. In Massachusetts the State is spending $400,000 a year in placing children in homes and looking after them.

There are three societies in the City of Boston doing that work. Now you must confront this proposition. We must raise our standard of work for dependent children (Applause). We must realize that we have no right to place children in family homes unless we are prepared to watch over and supervise them with the utmost fidelity. We must employ people of character, consecration and training to do this work and we must expend freely as much money as may be necessary in order to do it right.

Mr. F. H. Nibecker, Superintendent of the Institution at Glen Mills, was received with applause, and addressed the Convention as follows:

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen:

Having only a few minutes I propose to exercise the prerogatives of a member of some years standing in this organization, and also one who is particularly interested in children, having given most of the effective years of my life to the care of children, and protest against our organization becoming simply an organization for the consideration of subjects dealing with children. This is the Association of the Directors of the Poor and Charities, and if we are to influence all forms of charity and build them up and make this an effective association it will be necessary for us to take into consideration, each time we meet, all the various phases of charitable and correctional work that are prosecuted in the State, else we will reduce the field of our organization simply to the work of an Association to consider the welfare of children. I think that would be a misfortune, and would place us out of the category of Associations of Charities and Corrections. So I hope our officers and committees for next year will see that our whole time is not given to the consideration of the child. I know there is nothing more important in the world than the child. I believe that work for and with children is the pleasantest because it gives the most absolute, quick and patent results from the effort that is put forth; but all the rest of this work must be done and other workers need the benefit of the exchange of confidences and of views, and we ought to have in Pennsylvania, with all our efforts, an effective organization that shall deal with Charities and Corrections of every type. This year almost every session has been given up to the interest of the children. I think we have erred a little in that respect.

The most that has been said about the child has been said with reference to it from an objective and outside standpoint. The contributions have been from those whose observations have been dealing with it in only a fragmentary way, once a month or once a year seeing and observing some particular child and consequently do not deal with the possibility that there may be an appeal from the delinquent child the same as from another child. When we consider what is the basic cause of a child's delinquency, we are dealing with, and after we have come to a definite conclusion, we should consider what should be our basic effort to place that child upon a proper footing. We will immediately, in considering the basic causes of children's delinquency find that there is an absence in the child's attainments of proper education, I mean education in its broadest sense, that shall bring out of the child all that there is in it and develop every possibility that he may have.

What I appeal for in behalf of delinquent children is this kind of education. Suppose we bring the delinquent child before the Juvenile Court; suppose he is investigated and put on probation. Now, even if he remains on probation, what is done to give him the education he requires? Isn't he the same as he was, so far as education is concerned? The fact that he may not steal again, or that you may not see him when he steals, doesn't prove that he has been placed on the proper foundation for citizenship. If he is undeveloped then we haven't done anything for him, and our probation and our Court has failed. Now, I appeal for those children in whose case it develops that one of the causes of their delinquency is the fact that they have not been properly educated, mentally and morally, and physically, that they should be educated and the State and the schools of the State should do it.

If it were not that I am on record in print, many years ago for saying some such things, I would be afraid of saying what I am about to say, for fear of being accused of joining in the hue and cry against the public schools. A good many years ago I publicly stated that the graded school system of the United States was a mere fetich that we worship as a savage in Africa worships a bunch of bones or a whisp of hair. To prove the virtue of the system, we pick out the few children who have gone to college and forget the great multitude who have never gone far, because the education hasn't been furnished of the kind that will attract because it is adapted to the child; the great multitude have dropped out, simply because, as a teacher said to me once when I was advocating the breaking down of standards, "Where would be our standards, and what would become of our grades?" Not, "what would become of our children." The public schools should furnish this kind of proper education to our children. Don't speak of what they call the special grades in the public schools. Anyone who has investigated them will not put them as a solution of this problem. If the schools would do their work we wouldn't have to have schools that are adapted to doing the work of taking these children, that come untaught to fifteen years of age, and that have been out of school because they couldn't keep up with the grades.

My appeal is that something must be done so that these children in our schools may be educated so it won't be necessary for them to go away from home and away from tneir friends in order to be educated at all. Now, I will take a moment to make one more appeal: I think the highest crime committed against the juvenile delinquent, whom it is found necessary to send to a hospital, or a special school like mine, after every remedy has been prescribed and the surgeon's knife has proved too dull, and every experiment has been tried, I say it is crime in the people of this State to brand them because the State and society couldn't take proper care of them at home (Applause).

Because your homes, the result of your political and social systems—they are your homes; your body politics makes them what they are. Because your homes have failed, because your schools have failed to supply the needs, because your churches have failed to hold the character true, and your boys' clubs have failed to fill the life, because your Juvenile Courts have failed to check unfortunate tendencies, and everything in society has failed to do what this child had a right to expect of you; you have sent him to a hospital, then put the iron on his forehead and brand him, and the school, so that he never can get away from it.

I haven't much patience with those bearing official positions for the betterment of delinquents, who, after their amateurish efforts have failed, and they can no longer hide their failures, will brand the means that must take up their lost hope and correct the cause of their failures. These same, when all is lost, will place a danger warning on the plank and throw to the all but lost child, and make it to appear that life may be saved, but be blasted by the means of the saving. It is for the juvenile delinquent that I accept the retainer of love of justice, and stand at this bar to plead for justice.

If only the one saved, but cursed in saving, were to suffer, it were bad enough, but when you consider that every pupil who has gone before, and every one who is to come after, the enormity of the crime and injustice grows as the nations grow—by multiples. I hope God forgives those who brand the only instrument of hope that is left to them, and at last other influences than their own justice force them to use when they themselves have failed utterly. I say, I hope God forgives them for I have not yet reached that lofty height of perfect charity that can forgive anyone for any injustice that does not touch myself.

I have other pleas for the juvenile delinquent that the lateness of the hour compels me to allow to go unmade to-night.

PRESIDENT THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

The Secretary of the Association extended a very cordial invitation to Honorable Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States, to be present at our Convention in West Chester, Penna., or if his onerous and official duties would not permit him at this time to be present, to contribute a paper that we could insert in our reports, expressing his views on the question of "Child Labor."

The following letter was received from the President expressing his regret at not being able to be with us on the occasion, and contributing a paper expressing his views on the subject, which is taken from his message to Congress at its convening in 1907, which we have the pleasure of inserting in our reports.

"The White House," Washington,
September 24, 1908.

My Dear Sir:

Your favor of the 21st instant has been received and in reply the President requests me to express his regrets that he will be unable to accept the kind invitation of the Associated Charities of Pennsylvania for October 13-15, 1908.

The President feels that he can not write such a letter as you request, especially in view of the fact that he has already expressed his views on the subject to which you refer in his last annual message to Congress, a copy of which I enclose herewith. The paragraph on page 23 on Child Labor may be of service to you in the direction you indicate.

Very truly yours,
WILLIAM LOEB, JR.,
Secretary to the President.

Mr. L. C. Colborn, Somerset, Pa.

"CHILD LABOR."

It is idle to hold that without good laws evils such as child labor, as the overworking of women, as the failure to protect employes from loss of life or limb, can be effectively reached, any more than the evils of rebates and stock-watering can be reached without good laws. To fail to stop these practices by legislation means to force honest men into them, because otherwise the dishonest who surely will take advantage of them will have everything their own way. If the States will correct these evils, well and good; but the Nation must stand ready to aid them.

No question growing out of our rapid and complex industrial development is more important than that of the employment of women and children. The presence of women in industry reacts with extreme directness upon the character of the home and upon family life, and the conditions surrounding the employment of children bear a vital relation to our future citizenship. Our legislation in those areas under the control of Congress is very much behind the legislation of our more progressive States. A thorough and comprehensive measure should be adopted at this session of the Congress relating to the employment of women and children in the District of Columbia and the Territories. The investigation into the condition of women and children wage-earners recently authorized and directed by the Congress is now being carried on in the various States, and I recommend that the appropriation made last year for beginning this work be renewed, in order that we may have the thorough and comprehensive investigation which the subject demands. The National Government has as an ultimate resort for control of child labor the use of the interstate commerce clause to prevent the products of child labor from entering into interstate commerce. But before using this it ought certainly to enact model laws on the subject for the Territories under its own immediate control. * * *

JACOB S. STRINE,
CHARLES STILL, JR.,
J. LEWIS SRODES.

Upon motion the report of the Committee on Officers is adopted.

The Convention here adjourned until to-morrow morning, to meet at the Chester County Hospital for the Insane, after assembling in front of the Court House for the purpose of having a group picture of the delegates taken.

THURSDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 15—9 A. M.

The members of the Association assembled at the Court House and in front of the east porch a picture was taken. After which through the kindness of the Committee on Arrangements automobiles were provided and the members taken to the County Home and Hospital. The ride across the beautiful country and over splendid roads with a bracing air a distance of seven miles was most thoroughly enjoyed by all. Chester county has an ideal Almshouse, and one of the finest Hospitals in the State with a splendid farm of over 300 acres. She can well boast of the provisions made for her poor and unfortunate people. On our arrival we were met by a Reception Committee of the Children's Aid Society and the genial and very efficient Steward and Matron, Mr. and Mrs. Davis Garrett. The members were then conducted through the Almshouse Hospital and over the farm of this well-equipped and well-managed Almshouse and Hospital. It is the model farm of the county. The stock are all thoroughbreds and are the finest in all the country. Just back of the Home is a large hill upon which Washington camped and used as a lookout in the struggle of the Revolution at Valley Forge and Brandywine. Upon this hill the Daughters of the Revolution have planted a flag staff from which floats Old Glory silently but with a world of meaning in its folds and stars and stripes. As we gazed on this scene involuntarily all hats were raised and a salute given over this impressive scene. On returning to the home a most bountiful luncheon was spread and all did justice to it. After luncheon an informal meeting was held in the chapel when the President-elect, Hon. E. A. Boyne, was presented and made a few appropriate remarks, and again cordially extended an invitation for all to be present at Bradford, McKean county, next year.

The President was authorized to appoint the Program Committee and Legislative Committee as well as Delegates to National Convention.

The Committee on Resolutions made their report which was adopted and ordered to be printed in the report, after which all took automobiles and from there visited Cedarcroft the home of Bayard Taylor, Valley Forge and Brandywine Battlefield, and in the evening many visited the State Normal School and Sharples' Separator Works and other places in and about the city.

RESOLUTIONS.

Resolved, That we do hereby request the Legislative Committee to co-operate with the Commissioners appointed to codify the school laws of the State and to see that such provisions are enacted which will give authority to the School Boards or others to furnish proper and necessary clothing for children who are too poor or parents profligate by which they are deprived of them, and thus deprived of the schooling the law desires they should have.

Resolved, That this Convention learned with sadness of the deaths of Wm. H. Guy, Col. William Glenn and Thomas Hughes, who for many years were members of the Convention and who devoted much of their time to the ameliorating of the condition of their fellowmen in their institutions and their suggestive aid in our Conventions for so many years.

Resolved, That our sincere sympathy is hereby tendered to the relatives of the deceased and that a proper memorial be placed in our proceedings of them, and a copy of the proceedings be sent to the families of the deceased.

Resolved, That the thanks of the Convention are hereby tendered to John L. Smith, our President; Col. E. P. Gould and the Corresponding Secretary, L. C. Colborn, for their untiring efforts in working out the details of the Convention and for the full, complete and beautiful programs, and for their constant efforts to make the convention a success.

Resolved, That inasmuch as this Association has never decided upon a proper badge for the members, and inasmuch as there is at every convention a variety of badges represented, it is believed the time is here that the Convention should adopt a permanent badge.

Resolved, That the Executive Committee is hereby empowered and authorized to select and have prepared a proper badge for this Convention.

Resolved, That the sincere appreciation and thanks of this Association are extended to the generous Directors of the Poor and the Children's Aid Society of Chester County for their unbounded hospitality and their untiring efforts in behalf of the members of this Convention.

Resolved, That we express our thanks to the Commissioners of Chester county for the use of the Court House for the sessions of the Convention.

Resolved, That much of the inspiration of this Convention came from the fine music furnished by the boys of the Elwyn Institute, the Boys' Industrial School, of Glen Mills, and the High School students of West Chester.

Resolved, That the members of this Convention hereby tender their thanks to the Committee of Arrangements and the citizens of West Chester for their kindly welcome and generous hospitality.

Resolved, That we express our highest appreciation of the excellent and instructive addresses delivered by the speakers at the various sessions of the Convention.

Resolved, That the thanks of the Convention is due to the editors of the "Daily Local News" for the full and generous space in their paper and correct accounts of the proceedings of the Convention.

Resolved, That the thanks of the Convention are due to the Directors of the Poor of Chester county, for the uniform kindness and hospitality on the visit to the Home and Hospital. The good citizens of Chester county are to be congratulated of having a Board of such efficient Directors and for the substantial, convenient, comfortable and beautiful buildings, and provisions for the care of the poor, insane, and the homeless children.

Resolved, That we hereby express our disapproval of the action of delegates who are commissioned to attend this Convention at the expense of their several districts and fail without cause to be present at its sessions.

Resolved, That we urge upon the Legislative Committee to again present a bill to the next session of the Legislature for the appropriation of two thousand dollars for the two fiscal years, to this Association to enable the Association through its officers to carry on the work of the Association to greater aims and purposes, and that all the members of the Association use every endeavor through their representatives to secure its passage in the House and Senate and approval by the Governor.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

F. H. YOST,
DR. W. A. PAIN,
DR. MARTIN W. BARR,
MRS. ADALAIDE COMFORT,
THOMAS CASSIDY,
MRS. E. S. LINDSEY,
MRS. L. B. WALTON,
PROF. D. EMMERT,
O. P. BOHLER.

FRIDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 16.

A number of the members upon a very cordial invitation from Mr. F. H. Nibecker, Superintendent of the House of Refuge, took the train for Glen Mills where they were graciously welcomed and most royally entertained. Mr. Nibecker is a host within himself and nothing was spared to make the visit of each one pleasant and a surprise. This is an ideal place and an ideal institution. Superintended by one who is a master in the art of training and caring for delinquent boys.

All were doubly repaid for this visit. From thence a few stopped at Elwyn to visit the Feeble Minded Institute, superintended and presided over by Dr. M. W. Barr. No greater institution can be found in the nation than this. The marvelous work of training these unfortunate weaklings is wonderful and surprising to all. The entertainment and reception of the members was most delightful and pleasing in the extreme. Dr. Barr is the right man in the right place, and we return our thanks to him for his kindness to us. From thence the members took their leave to their homes with the universal verdict that the convention at West Chester was the largest, most interesting and best ever held.

REPORT OF STATE INSTITUTION FOR FEEBLE-MINDED OF WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA.

The State Institution for Feeble-Minded of Western Pennsylvania is beautifully located on a plateau among the hills of Venango county. Polk—post office and railroad station on the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railway six miles west of Franklin—is but a few minutes' walk from the institution.

The Trustees of the Institution are: President, Hon. W. T. Bradberry, Allegheny, Pa.; Secretary, Gen. John A. Wiley, Franklin, Pa.; Mr. O. D. Bleakley, Franklin, Pa.; Dr. G. W. Magee, Oil City, Pa.; Hon. S. H. Miller, Mercer, Pa.; George F. Davenport, Esq., Meadville, Pa.; Mr. Anderson H. Walters, Johnstown, Pa.; Mr. J. N. Davidson, Allegheny, Pa.

Superintendent—Dr. J. M. Murdoch.

The aim of the institution is to provide suitable training for all children in Western Pennsylvania, who, by reason of mental deficiency are incapable of receiving instruction in the common schools, and to provide a home and suitable employment for those who, after passing through the school department, have not developed mentally to a degree to make it possible for them to take a place in the outside world without detriment to themselves or others.

The institution is primarily for children. The training is carried along about the same lines as are pursued at the older institution at Elwyn, and as the Association is to visit Elwyn it would be needless for me to go into a description of the method of training pursued. The western institution is in fact an offshoot from the parent institution at Elwyn. It was established and opened its doors for the reception of children in 1897. The institution is now caring for 1300 inmates, is very greatly crowded and has a large number of applications for admission on hand.

The movement of population for the year ending September 30, 1908, was as follows:

Number in Institution at beginning of year	1273
Admitted during year	120
Discharged	93
Living in the Institution at the end of year	1300

Of the ninety-three discharged fifty-four were more or less improved; three were transferred to hospitals for the insane and thirty-six died. Of the one hundred and twenty admissions, twenty-two were re-admissions.

The average cost of each inmate per week is $3.50.

There are 1260 acres of land connected with the institution.

The estimated value of real estate, including buildings, is $857.463.

There are now under course of construction four buildings which will materially increase the capacity and efficiency of the institution. One custodial building, which will accommodate 250 children; one industrial building which will make possible more effective training of the children along industrial lines; two large barn buildings which will make it possible to largely increase the excellent herd of cattle and production of milk and provide storage for produce from farm and garden.

We expect the new custodial building will be ready for occupancy about April 1st and at this time the institution will be able to admit all children for whose admission applications are now on file.

Although we have not received as many children this year as last, our work has increased to a greater extent as we have had more to do with larger children, some that have been turned over by the Court to our Society to give them a better chance than if sent to a Reform School. We have not regretted taking charge of these, that might be called "Juvenile cases," as we have, through Children's Aid Societies of other counties, been able to place them in good homes, where they are kindly treated and trained to take care of themselves, in many cases getting wages. These girls are not bad, but belong to foreigners, who, because the child does not want to do as much work as they wish, will bring them before the Justice to be sent to a Reform School to make them mind. The parents, not understanding that when they put their girl in jail, that is not what they wish. The Court, about two years ago, had a mother and stepfather commit a girl saying "they wanted her sent away for one year to make her a good girl." The Judge committed her to our Society. We found that she was not bad, but they did not understand how to manage her. Through another county she was placed in an excellent home. At the end of the year, the mother commenced to annoy us to return her girl, saying "If she is not good send her again back." We left the girl in the home that had been provided for her until the two years were up, when we allowed her to return to her mother, under our care, so we could protect her. She told me she was glad she was under the care of the Children's Aid Society, now she knew if her people didn't treat her right she would be protected by us.

We are still no nearer a temporary home for our children than last year and are having some trouble about boarding homes, as we are not able to get people that will take them for the small amount we can pay. It means a great deal of work, feeding, washing, ironing and giving these children the care they all require, especially as so many of them are babies. We have been and still are perplexed to know what to do with so many little ones and so few boarding homes for our children.

All of our county officials encourage us and tell us how satisfactory our work is to them; they appreciate all we are doing for these helpless little ones and think we are doing too much, but they do not know how they can relieve our work at present. If it were not for the kind words of encouragement we receive from our Judges, Commissioners and Directors, in fact from all our county officials, as well as all that know the great amount of work and the good we are doing, when we become discouraged and wish we could give up this charge, we think what is to become of this work that has taken so much time, patience and a great deal of worry to build up—what is to become of these innocent children that have been so neglected by their own families?

I am feeling the burden of these duties as I am getting up in years and in our county there are so few to do this immense work—in fact, about six or seven—but the greatest responsibilities come upon the Secretary, Mrs. Bowie, and myself. The young have too many pleasures to give up to undertake these heavy burdens and responsibilities, so the problem is "what are we to do with so many children?"

We are thankful and appreciate all that is done for our Society by our Directors, Superintendent and Matron, as well as by all our good friends. Our attorney, as well as any of our county officials and lawyers, are willing and ready at all times to assist us in a charity that is considered the best charity in the State—that of taking care of the little ones that, in many cases, are worse off than orphans—for by the Children's Aid Societies, they are being trained to be good men and women and take a place among honorable people in the world, when, if it were not for the Children's Aid Societies, in many cases, they would become criminals and a greater expense to the State as we claim, by training children, we are lessening the criminal list.

Again thanking all the friends that assist us, if only by kind words of encouragement, and to show appreciation of this work that is done by so few of us, and let us all remember what our Saviour said: "Whosoever shall receive one such little child, in my name, receiveth me."

PRESIDENT ELECT FOR 1910

THE THIRTY-FIFTH ANNUAL CONVENTION

OF THE

ASSOCIATION OF

Directors of the Poor and Charities

OF THE

STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA

HELD AT

BRADFORD, McKEAN COUNTY

October 12, 13 and 14, 1909.

The Thirty-fifth Annual Convention of the Association of Directors of the Poor and Charities of Pennsylvania met at Lyceum Hall, Bradford, Pa., on Tuesday, October 12th, 1909, and after thirty minutes spent in greetings, etc., the Convention was called to order by the President, Hon. E. A. Boyne, of Bradford, at 10:30 a. m.

Mrs. Chas. Luce, of Bradford, favored the Convention with a beautiful vocal solo, responding to an encore by singing a very pretty negro lullaby.

The invocation, by Rev. H. W. Bieber, of Bradford, was given with the delegates all standing.

The freedom of the city was extended to the delegates by Hon. R. J. Hoffman, Mayor of Bradford, who was introduced by President Boyne and spoke as follows:

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen: I arise with no little pleasure to welcome the delegates of the Thirty-fifth Annual Convention of the Directors of the Poor and Charities of Pennsylvania to our city. We have just had a celebration of the thirtieth anniversary of our city, and a great many of the visitors are yet with us and with these two events coming in the same year our citizens are proud of it. We want you to feel that the people of Bradford are in hearty sympathy with your work. We have looked forward with pleasure to your coming. The different Associations represented here are among the most important in the several communities that you represent throughout the State, and therefore your people have selected representative citizens to fill these positions and we feel that we are entertaining delegates who have a far greater knowledge of the various branches of this great work of charity than we have and that we will be benefitted by your meeting with us. We are proud to have you within our gates. We hope that you will all have occasion to remember the Convention at Bradford with pleasure. The city is yours. We are going to show you the best that we have, and try to make you wish that Bradford were your home. Once again we welcome you, and I now turn you over to your worthy President and his Committee, who will now take care of you.

Applause.

Hon. R. B. Stone of Bradford, Trustee of the Warren State Hospital, was here introduced by President Boyne and welcomed the delegates on behalf of the Childrens' Aid Socities, in the following happy manner:

Ladies and Gentlemen:

You have been invited to this city by your President, one of our leading citizens, and have been welcomed by our Mayor, whose word goes; you have received the freedom of the city, but after all, if I understand the situation, you are not quite certain, yet, that you haven't taken us by surprise. Let me say, then, ladies and gentlemen, and delegates to this Convention, let me whisper the fact that old Father Time and Dame Nature have conspired and have been at work for centuries to make this welcome to you what it should be, wet and warm. They have lifted up the hills and formed them about you into the petals of a beautiful flower; and see how the petals have been tinted into bloom for the hour of your coming. (Applause). It is little, in comparison, that we who are thus doubly blessed can do to celebrate your visit, but I assure you that you will not need to fumble for our latch strings. Five thousand doors will open at your approach and twenty thousand people will bid you welcome, and the best people on earth, gathered from all the States of the Union and the nationalities of the world. Ladies and gentlemen, you have touched here one of the high places of the Commonwealth, but I assure you, no matter how fast you may be traveling, you will need nothing more evhilarating than the nectar of our mountain springs, and if it doesn't rain all the time you will get an enormous appetite in this ambrosial air.

We are 1500 feet above the level of the sea and the trolley cars run to 2100 feet. I sleep on a mountain top every night and hitch my aeroplane to a star.

There are no poor people in Bradford, except the Poor Board, and we think they are entitled to high credit. We are all rich, but we don't deny our debts. We all have a share in these beautiful hills and the bubbling springs and the invigorating air. Help yourselves, ladies and gentlemen, and while you stay among us I hope you will all feel like Columbus, as though you had discovered a new world and that it was yours.

Applause.

In behalf of the people of Bradford I welcome you all to the chief city of the hills of Pennsylvania.

Applause.

Mrs. S. E. Vantine, President of the McKean County Childrens' Aid Society, responded to the Address of Welcome, as follows:

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen of this Convention:

This morning I am very much in the position of a friend of mine who gave an address recently at a womans' convention in this city. I am so much more accustomed to attending womens' conventions and gatherings than a convention of this kind that I am surprised that I did not address your Honorable President as "Madam." (Laughter.)

This friend of mine was fourth on the platform, and she stated that before she left home she prepared what she considered a pretty impromptu speech, but that the first speaker used part of her material, and the second some more, and the third finished it.

After the beautiful Addresses of Welcome you have listened to I fear that my impromptu speech would cause someone to give me the advice that was recently given to a young and aspiring authoress. She sent her story to the editor of a magazine and not receiving any reply wrote for a speedy decision; for, she said, "she had other irons in the fire." The editor replied that after reading the story and giving it careful consideration he advised her to "put it with the other irons."

The Childrens' Aid Society of McKean County gives you a most hearty and cordial welcome. We have been living in anticipation of the pleasure of your coming for months.

This Society is the youngest, with one exception, of any in western Pennsylvania; but we have known for years of the grand work being done in the State by the Directors of the Poor and by the women of the Children's Aid Society. We are glad to sit at your feet and learn. It is not so much for our personal benefit, but that we may go out and do better service for the poor and dependent children that come under our care. I don't know that we can give you anything of benefit to carry away with you, but we do hope to add a little to your pleasure and entertainment while you are with us. In the years to come I trust that you will remember these few days in Bradford with pleasure, and will remember us as you would remember friends.

Applause.

Mr. F. H. Nibecker, Superintendent House of Refuge, Glen Mills, Pa., was received with applause and responded to the Address of Welcome as follows:

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen:

I suppose the time of greatest pleasure to the prima donna is when she is prevented from singing and giving a rousing welcome before she has electrified her audience by the first note, on the ground of her great name and her previous performances. That is our position today; we haven't done anything yet and we feel all the more pleased to have received so excellent a welcome upon the ground of reputation made by previous good work.

It is very fortunate, I think, that Bradford is one of the high places, because this Association, as they say, we are "going some" and only touch the high places, and we congratulate Bradford that it is one of the high places. I don't think there is anyone here who has not felt the inspiration of the high places in this beautiful country, and the intoxication of this bracing air. We all come here hoping to turn all of this intoxication and this uplift by the aesthetic surroundings that Nature spreads out before us, to some good use, in furtherance of the ends and purposes that bring us together, and in which we expect to co-operate with the people of Bradford and Bradford with us, in the improvement of those matters that can be improved in our work.

There are two great principles recognized in modern life in everything, whether in business or philanthropy. These are the principles of specialization and association. There are some who are like the quacks and charatans in medicine; who can do more than all the specialists, and who receive a large clientage because of their own supreme nerve and the credulity of the public. There are some such in the work of philanthropy and charity; but we believe the fact is recognized that there is but one way to do anything in this day and that is to do one thing. That no one is wide enough and none are large enough to do all things and do them well.

This Convention is an exemplification of that specialization; of the bringing to bear of the thoughts of many minds and the study of many years upon one subject, and that is the subject that engrosses the attention of those that are engaged by public behest in caring for the many that cannot care for themselves, and oftener for those who will not care for themselves, but ought.

There should be nothing that may in any way interfere with this specialization in philanthropy, in charity and in correction; nothing should allow us for one moment to diverge from that purpose, of bringing our efforts to bear upon one special line of work, whatever that work may be that we are doing.

You cannot go into any great association where capital has been brought together and find one man doing all kinds of work. You cannot go into anything that involves complicated effort but you find specialists dealing with each part of that work. It is just as true in the work of charity as it is done in this day. It is no longer simply making another's need an excuse for the effort on our part, and feeling so satisfied with ourselves because we have done something, whether good or bad, and often as much harm as good.

It is as true in this as in any other line, that for this work to be done well it must be done by those who have learned by experience how to do it. It would be as foolish for us, with all our mathematical education, to begin where every child begins.

We must start with all the accumulation of wisdom that has come to the world by the efforts and failures of those who have gone before. But it is also equally true that in order that the work for humanity may be as a whole, not a fragmentary work, in no way correlated, but made a real living entity in itself, that all this specialization should be associated, just as the specialization of great productive corporations are associated in their central head.

Now we are here because we believe in these things. If we did not we might as well have lost this great uplift that comes from Nature's prodigal hand in Bradford, and stayed at home. We might as well have never come together.

It is because of this necessary association of effort that we are here in Bradford, and if we fail to get results, from the action and reaction of one mind upon another, I fear it will be our own fault, because there must be some reaction from the attrition of active minds.

I wish to thank our friends at Bradford for their kind and generous welcome to us.

Applause.

Mrs. E. S. Linsley, of Warren, responded to the Address of Welcome as follows, on behalf of the Children's Aid Societies.

I think that you must feel the same despair, in seeing my familiar face once more, that the old lady did at the meeting held by one of the great evangelists. He was describing the awful day of wrath and his description was intensely vivid of the weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth. An old lady in the gallery leaned over and exclaimed: "I haven't got a tooth in my head." "Madam," said the evangelist, "have no fear. In that awful day of wrath false teeth will be provided, both upper and lower sets." (Laughter.)

I feel that the reason of my being present in a conspicuous position today might be summed up in the response of the Democratic party to William Jennings Bryan's speech, the title of which was "Watchman, what of the night," and the Democratic party responded: "The night is dark and I am far from home; you led me on." (Laughter.)

I shall offer no apologies for my remarks, because as you well know —those of you who have had the inestimable privilege of knowing me for a number of years—you may nail Dr. Cook to the pole and you may nail Peary to the pole, but you can't nail me to anything.

We of the Children's Aid Society have come to Bradford with the feeling that we shall gain inspiration for the work. Of Bradford it may be truly said that there need be no homeless child, since the beautiful Home of the Children's Aid Society and the mother-love is awaiting every little waif in the city of Bradford. No word is needed to express our appreciation of the kindness of the people of Bradford. Its reputation for cordiality is too well known to need dwelling upon, but certainly no response of welcome can be perfect, on the part of the Children's Aid Society, unless it includes this Convention, which has welcomed the Children's Aid Society of Western Pennsylvania as its guest for many years. This Association has been our inspiration and our help on all occasions, and we thank them most heartily for always including us on the programmes.

After a careful study of old English chronicles I find that Bradford, and many other fords, owed their origin to gentlemen, knights, who were out hunting lost and at that moment a deer always sprang out of the woods and led the way.

The deers are here, and if you need us we are ready. (Laughter.)

I have often wondered whose inspiration it was to call this Society the Children's Aid. Whose life work is to bring "the motherless babe and the babeless mother together, to love one another." Surely it is the most beautiful work that has ever been given to woman to do.

In conclusion I would like to quote a little of that old German legend that refers to the time in early days when heaven's gates were barred against earth. A little child died and went to Paradise, and all the time mourned for its mother. Finally praying the Mother of Heaven that light might stream in and God commanded that the key should be given into the hands of the child and safe in the little hands was the key, "and the gates forever ajar." And so it is in this work, to those who understand it, the key is in the hands of a little child.

Applause.

ADDRESS OF PRESIDENT BOYNE.

I am sorry to say that it has come down to me now. I was in hopes I could keep you interested until adjourning time, and adjourn for dinner, and not come back after dinner. (Laughter.) You have listened to what our worthy Mayor has said. He has extended to you, willingly and cheerfully, the freedom of the city. Mr. R. B. Stone, one of our leading attorneys, and one of the trustees of the State Hospital at Warren, has given you a hearty welcome. Mrs. Vantine, President of the Children's Aid Society, has been generous in welcoming you. I would have to throw a boquet at Mrs. Linsley to do her justice. If you will promise not to throw any bricks at me I have a little conglomeration of my own. I will try and give it, but I am ready to stop now. It makes me feel like the fellow who was going to be married the first time (and for most of us it is the last time). He was nervous and waiting for the time of the ceremony and he looked out of the window for the orchestra and couldn't see them coming and he came out on the veranda and couldn't see them and he came back into the house and says to his friends: "I don't know what to do; if I had someone who could play or sing a piece it would help pass the time," and one of his young chums spoke up and says: "I can sing a piece," and he says "all right. I will be glad to have you sing anything you want to; anything will do, I a mso nervous." (He was about as nervous as I am now). (Laughter.)

He says: "I will tell you. I will go upstairs and bring my bride down and when I come down and am ready to come in I will nod my head, and then you commence to sing." And he went upstairs and brought his bride down and nodded his head to his chum and the fellow commenced and sang like this (singing) "Oh, you are up against the real thing now." (Laughter and applause.)

Now that sounds better than a brick would feel.

Ladies and Gentlemen, Members of this the Thirty-fifth Annual Convention of the Association of the Directors of the Poor and Charities of Pennsylvania:

I am more than gratified at seeing so many here and I sincerely hope that nothing will happen to mar the pleasure of your stay while within our limits. I assure you it is a great pleasure to us to think you have so honored us in choosing this city for holding the convention in. It will be another bright spot in the life of the city of Bradford and let us hope that all our doings will tend towards the relief of suffering humanity wherever found, to prove that we are all

"for the cause that needs assistance and the wrongs that need resistance,
And the future in the distance
And the good that we can do."

If it would not be out of place here I would like to offer a suggestion that the Committee on Legislation do their best to have an act passed into a law to make it an extraditable offense for a man or a thing calling himself a man to desert his family and then go into the next state, leaving them to suffer the pangs of hunger when the children become dwarfed mentally, physically and morally. I would recommend as punishment the whipping post. In the State of Delaware the whipping post is the law and the punishment for wife beating. It is hard for me to say which is the worst crime, wife beating or wife desertion. Desertion of family is becoming so common that there should be something done to prevent it. Therefore I recommend the whipping post and a good husky woman to apply it, one who has suffered desertion herself. It would seem that she could do a first-class job. After the punishment he should be made to give bonds for the support of his wife and children or be locked up. I believe we should be kind in doing charity. Give what we have to give with an open hand and not with a clinched fist. I have seen people give charity in so grudging a way that it looked almost like stealing to take it. It may not be our fault for being poor and needing charity. Circumstances over which we have no control are the circumstances that control us, so we should be charitably inclined to all who stand in need, for—

"It is not to pause when at my door
A shivering brother stands,
It is not to ask what made him poor,
Or why he help demands.

The voice of charity is kind,
She thinketh nothing wrong,
To every fault she seemeth blind,
Nor vaunteth with her tongue.

In penitence she places faith,
Hope smileth at her door
Relieve him first, then softly say,
Go brother, sin no more."

The remarks of President Boyne were received with applause.

Mr. L. C. Colborn moved that the various Committees be made up at the noon adjournment. Adopted.

The Convention here adjourned until 2 p. m.

JOHN S. STRINE

COLUMBIA, PA.

Memorial

JACOB S. STRINE

Jacob Smith Strine, for more than twenty-eight years a member of the Board of Poor Directors of Lancaster County, died at his home in Columbia, Penna., on January 9th, 1909, aged seventy-eight years. At the time of his death Mr. Strine was serving his ninth consecutive term of election.

In 1881 he was appointed to fill a vacancy on the Board and at the expiration of his appointive term was elected for the full term of three years, succeeding himself at each subsequent election. He always took an acitve interest in Poor work and was honored by his own Board as well as the State Board of Charities and the State Association of Poor Directors. Mr. Strine was born in Columbia, Lancaster County, Penna., on April 10th, 1831 and was a son of John Michael Strine, an early settler and a prominent resident of Columbia in his day. He received a common school education and in early life took an active interest in the politics of his county and was frequently honored. He was sheriff of his county from 1878 to 1881, and served his home town as Mayor, in Council and upon the Board of Education and at the time of his death was a Trustee of the Old Columbia Public Ground Company and a Director at the Columbia Hospital.

He was an ardent Republican and a leader in his locality, besides being one of the best known men in the county as well as one of the hardest workers in the ranks of his party. He was especially strong at primaries and his influence was eagerly sought after by the leaders and candidates. He was ever popular with every one who knew him and was a useful citizen. He was generous and kind to every one and was ready to extend a helping hand or do a favor for those asking him. He was a good citizen and is greatly missed by the poor of Columbia, who he was always ready to assist in time of need. He read the news of the day with great avidity and was keen in his recollection of the local history of the past. To his latest day he cherished a great fondness for little children. He was beloved by his family, admired by his friends and respected by the community in which he lived and died.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention was called to order at 2 P. M. by President Boyne.

Mrs. Cameron and Mr. Robb were invited to the platform by President Boyne, as he said "to support him," as "Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown."

President Boyne:—You remember at the adjournment I thought I had lost my hat, and I thought it was bad taste, in a Meeting of this kind, for anyone to steal the President's hat; but I have found my hat, and I had it all the time, but my head wasn't in its normal condition, and didn't fit my hat. (Laughter.)

Mr. Colborn, at the request of President Boyne, announced the following Committees as having been appointed by the chair:

COMMITTEE ON OFFICERS—Fred Fuller, Scranton; Frank Redman, Allegheny; Charles Still, Germantown; Mrs. Sue Willard, Indiana; Mrs. Florence Cameron, Chester; J. F. Yeckley, Lackawanna, F. B. Bausman, Lancaster.

PLACE OF MEETING—F. A. Mackin, Luzerne; Charles Loesel, Erie; John McDowell, Montgomery; J. S. Gray, Cambria; John L. Black, Franklin; Mrs. A. P. Bowie, Fayette; Mrs. E. S. Vantine, Bradford.

AUDITING COMMITTEE— H. W. Osche, Allegheny; H. F. Yost, Somerset; Frank Grove, Green.

RESOLUTIONS—Dr. J. Lewis Shrodes, Allegheny; Elliot P. Kistner, Hazleton; W. C. Gruber, Lancaster; F. H. Nibecker, Glen Mills; Mrs. E. S. Linsley, Warren; Charles S. Snyder, Philadelphia; Geo. F. Guy, Bradford; Mrs. J. N. Nixon, Westmoreland; F. P. Schoonmaker, Bradford.

Following the announcement of the Committees Prof. W. N. Burt, Superintendent of the Deaf and Dumb School at Edgewood, read the following interesting paper, which was received with applause: ,

"REPORT OF DEAF AND DUMB SCHOOL OF EDGEWOOD"

The benevolences of the people of our country are as numerous and varied as the misfortunes of mankind. One of the glories of our civilization is the care bestowed upon those who are handicapped in the race of life. No form of misery has been left out in the ministrations of our various benevolent organizations. My life has been among a class of unfortunates concerning whom little is known by the general public and in point of numbers is one of the smallest—namely the children of silence. It is perhaps unprofitable to make comparisons between the various ills of life. All are hard to bear and each has its particular hardships. The question: "Would you rather be blind than deaf, insane than feebleminded, should rather give place to thankfulness that we are not afflicted in any of these ways but that a kind Providence has given us the full use of our senses and complete control of all our bodily and mental powers. But I will say in passing that deafness is a terrible calamity, the magnitude of which cannot be realized without experiencing it. Most people think that a deaf child is like his hearing brother in all respects except that he lacks hearing, but they fail to appreciate the deep significance of the loss of this sense. It is the severance of the medium through which human intercourse is possible and causes isolation from the intellectual affairs of the world around him as complete as that which separates the Indian from the civilization of the Twentieth Century. A child born deaf in the family of the most devout Christian minister allowed to grow up without attending a school for the deaf would know no more of the truths of the Christian religion than a heathen in darkest Africa. Fortunately the number of the deaf is very small. The most reliable statistics shows but one to every 1800 of the general population. Of this number one-third are born without hearing and two-thirds lose their hearing from sickness or accident usually in infancy. The only reason for the existence of institutions for the deaf is that there are so few deaf children in any community that it is necessary to gather them together in some central place from a large territory in order to have enough to form classes to make their education an economical possibility. The Institution over which I have the privilege of presiding is situated in the suburbs of Pittsburg. It is known as the Western Pennsylvania Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, and has for its purpose the education of all the deaf children living in the western counties of our State. We have an enrollment this year of 267 boys and girls and an average attendance of 228 pupils. It is not a "Home" or "Asylum" but a school. The text books used are nearly the same as those used in our public schools. There is one essential difference between our school and the schools for hearing children. The first years of the school life of our children are spent in acquiring a knowledge of language. They come to us without any means of communication except the crude signs that they have invented to make known their most elementary wants at home. They do not know the names of the objects about them and in point of mental development fall far short of normal children. There are two methods of teaching the deaf, one is known as the sign or manual method, in which gestures and finger spelling are used; the other is the oral method in which speech and speech reading are substituted for the signs and finger spelling. The oral method is the one pursued in our school in the main. Nineteen of our twenty-one classes are taught by this method and two by the sign method. It is impossible to convey an adequate idea of how a child is taught without the presence of the child himself, but a few words concerning the subject may not be uninteresting. He is first taught the elements of speech, which to him are utterly meaningless and inane but which are absolutely necessary as a prelude to acquiring speech, for it is by combining these elements that words are formed. A sound easily made is chosen to begin the lesson with, such as h-o-t, and their combinations. If you will pronounce the words papa and mama you will notice that the motion of the lips is the same in both cases, but in the case of papa the breath is emitted. To show this to the child various artifices are resorted to. One is to hold a lighted candle before the mouth and show that in making the sound p the candle flickers. The child enters into this sport with some zeal and tries to make the sound emphatic enough to blow the candle out. In many words of two elements only one is sounded. Take hat for instance. If you speak the word even at the top of your voice the ha alone is sounded; with the t the breath is emitted without voice. So with many other words, as "hot, hate," etc. The pupil in pronouncing words watches the motions of the teacher's lips, the position of her tongue and places his hand on her throat to feel the vibrations there. Most of us find it hard to learn a foreign language with the aid of perfect hearing, but picture to yourself the difficulty one would encounter in being compelled to learn German or French from a teacher who had lost his voice and could only move his lips in giving instruction. It would be impossible to acquire correct pronounciation from him, yet this is the task that a deaf child faces when he tries to master our English tongue, with the added difficulty that while we would approach the problem with minds developed by the possession of another language he has to learn the language first and gain his education afterwards. This road to learning is a long and difficult one, yet by industry and perseverance the pupil is able in time to tell from the motion of the vocal organs what the speaker says and to reply in speech that is intelligible, though perhaps harsh and unnatural.

The other method of teaching the deaf is easier. In it signs or gestures are substituted for the spoken word. The sign language is not an arbitrary code of motions. It had its origin in the natural signs that we all use more or less. I know a gentleman so addicted to their use that he cannot talk into a telephone without gesticulating vigorously. We use them instinctively. I shall now describe briefly the method used by the teachers in the sign department. Here written language alone is taught. The instructor writes a short word on the black-board, say "hat"; she then points to the letters one by one and makes the signs for them. As she does so she then shows him the object, he soon grasps the idea that the combination of letters means hat. She follows this with another word containing some of the same letters, say "cat". The child promptly points to the hat, for he does not know that different objects have different names. The teacher this time shows the picture of a cat, or better still, the cat itself, and gives the class to understand that the new word means cat. This usually calls forth many wonderful statements from the members of the class, made in crude but expressive signs. Some have two cats at home, others three or four kittens. Some have kittens that play, others cats that scratch, etc. In a few days the child realizes that all the objects about him have names and his curiosity is aroused. He points to the various objects in the room and wants the teacher to write their names. Following this the adjectives may be taught. Two hats may be shown, one black, the other brown, and the teacher will write a black hat, a brown hat. The children thus learn that colors too have names. Proceeding thus step by step abstract ideas are soon introduced, such as good and bad, ugly and pretty, etc. The teacher usually has material in her class to illustrate these qualities, for there is always sure to be a bad boy in the number against whom all have a grievance and when he is compared with some gentle child the difference is quickly noted, much to the dispargement of the offender. So that when you write "John is bad" there is instant and enthusiastic acceptance of the statement, for they know that there is something wrong with John.

An ever-present obstacle to the acquisition of language to the deaf is the fact that the English language is highly artificial in its structure. The deaf child thinks in the natural order of words, the order of the primitive languages. To him a black cat is cat black, a tall man, a man tall. If he were to say in his own language "That boy is my brother," it would be "boy that brother my is." In writing he has to study how to transpose the words to bring them into the English order. Some of their efforts to write correct sentences are amusing and ingenious. A little fellow had seen some people at a political meeting shouting for their candidate and asked for the word expressing the action. He was told that it was hurrah. The next day after an exciting play with his dog he came into school and wrote: "My dog ran and hurrahed with his tail." Being told that the sentence was incorrect another lad went to the black-board and amended it thus: "John's dog ran and hurrahed with his wag." As this did not pass muster a third child took the chalk and with much confidence wrote: "John's dog ran and waved his tail."

The question may be asked what, after all, are the net results of this patient labor of the teacher and the no less patient efforts of the pupil. Does it pay? Yes it pays. It pays the State that generously appropriates the money to support the schools, for from them go forth young men and women who are equipped intellectually, morally and industrially to take their places in society as self-supporting, law-abiding and useful citizens, who, uneducated, would be a life-long charge upon her bounty. It pays the teacher, for she finds her reward in the grateful appreciation of her pupils. As it is on the afflicted child that the mother pours forth all the love she is capable of, so it is the afflicted child that calls forth the devotion of the conscientious teacher. It pays the child, for it brings him from the darkness of mental barbarism into the glorious light of the present day. Yes, again I say, it pays.

In the absence of Dr. Murdock, Dr. John Irwin Zerbe, Assistant Physician at the Institute for Feeble-Minded, at Polk, addressed the Convention as follows:

Dr. Murdock hasn't written any paper. I will try and give a little idea of what has happened at Polk within the past year. I presume Dr. Black reported to you at your last meeting that we were building new barns and an Industrial building and a Custodial building. The barns have been practically finished except one cow barn, and that will make it possible to have our own milk supply. The industrial building has been finished. The lower floor is used for sewing and mending rooms, one room for a school room, and the second and third floors as dormitories for the nurses.

The Custodial building has been turned over by the contractors and about two weeks ago we started to admit into that building. Our population up to the time of the completion of that building was 1350. Yesterday afternoon when I left we had 1397.

It doesn't mean that the cases we can admit now must be custodial cases. We also use that building for certain classes of helpless cases. Whenever a representative of the Children's Aid Society or from one of the Poor Districts comes with a new boy or girl we don't have to play checkers to find a place for that child. We have room.

In the next two weeks we expect to clear up our entire waiting list, and we will then be able to consider applications other than those on the waiting list. We admitted during the last year about 150 cases. Our death rate was a little more than last year. This year it has been 34 or 35 cases. Next year we fear a higher death rate. We will admit more new cases than before, and the probability is that many of them will be low-grade imbeciles and idiots, and very often that class doesn't stand the change of season and a change of food very well.

Of the 1400 children we have only about 250 in school. We have about 105 working on the farm at present, 84 or 85 in the kitchens and dining and vegetable rooms, about the same number in the shops, and a few about the dairy and a few on the lawns and some in the sewing rooms, and the remainder that are able to work are helping in taking care of those who are not able to look after themselves.

It may seem queer that we have only about one in five in school; but we are teaching boys and girls to do things about the cottages and about the farm and in the industrial departments. We are doing something to make them worth a little more, at least, than they have been before.

Last winter, for the first time in the history of the Institution, there wasn't a sufficient amount of cold in our locality to give us an ice supply. Heretofore we have had plenty of ice, and ice to sell. We now have a splendidly-equipped cold storage, in every way sufficient for our needs.

What we are planning to do now is to build a little mortuary, to connect up with a certain spring, and to install two new dynamos and two new engines.

In sending children to us there are two classes I wish you wouldn't send. That is, we get cases that should go to a Home for the Insane. Last fall we had to transfer about eighteen to Dixmont, six to Warren and one to Mercer. You must remember that our institution is on the cottage plan and we cannot possibly look after cases of insanity.

Another thing: We receive old people that their only form of mental impairment is a little senile decay. Of course we can look after that class, but we prefer that you send us the other classes of cases, and we will do the best we can with them.

Mr. Nibecker:—What percentage of your children can be returned to their homes with advantage to themselves and to society?

Dr. Zerbe:—I would rather see ten low-grade children discharged than to see one high-grade boy or girl leave our institution. We have every reason to believe that the principal factor in feeble-mindedness is heredity. If we let a low-grade boy or girl go out there is no possibility, or little possibility, that they will be responsible for the bringing into this world of more feeble-minded children; but if we let a high-grade boy or girl go out there is that possibility. If we could put into institutions all the feeble-minded boys and girls in the land and keep them there there would come a time when the proportion of feeble-minded children would be much lower than it is now.

In England the proportion of feeble-minded is a little more than one to six hundred. I think it is about the same in this county. I know a Township in this State, of one thousand, where there are to my knowledge six feeble-minded children. Of course that is an exception.

Col. E. P. Gould (Erie):—What proportion of the feeble-minded children sent to Polk do the parents and relatives take an interest in, and do not make you feel that they are unloading a charge upon you?

Dr. Zerbe:—The other day the mother of five of our children, every one of them an idiot, came back and announced the fact that she had been married again. In reply to Col. Gould's question I will have to approximate that, but I fancy that about thirty to forty per cent. I will make it forty per cent of the children that have parents living—the parents will either visit them from time to time or send letters of inquiry. There are some that I feel are showing more affection to those of their children that are our charge than they do to those at home. I think that is natural.

Mr. L. C. Colborn:—Do any of the feeble-minded children that come to you have proper training; do they ever become self-sustaining?

Dr. Zerbe:—We get a number of children, called high grade, that can be taught a trade. I have in my care now half a dozen boys that make the shoes used in the institution, and about twenty-five boys in the tailor shops.

There was one we sent to Lakeside that has charge of the tailor shop there. Quite a number make good farm hands, and a number that know more about chickens than I could ever know. But even though they can do enough to make their living they will need someone to help them out at times. In plain language, they cannot develop a normal sense of responsibility. They haven't an exact sense of right and wrong, not the sense of self-control or of personal judgment, and you might add, initiative.

Col. Gould:—Do any of them have a very high moral sense?

Dr. Zerbe:—Some of them. Most of the higher grade have the sense of right and wrong fairly well developed.

A Voice:—Are there an appreciable number that come to the realization that they are not like other people?

Dr. Zerbe:—Quite a percentage of them, the higher grade. Quite a number feel that they have arrived at the stage where they think they can go out like other boys and girls. They all want to work.

Mr. Smith (Chester):—What percentage of them are due to the fact of intemperate parents?

Dr. Zerbe:—About five to ten per cent. of the history papers mention tuberculosis and intemperance, or delicate health. A vast majority of the papers will mention that when the child was a little fellow he had a fall. What child hasn't had a fall?

Mrs. Berry (Bradford):—What number would you say was due to social disease?

Dr. Zerbe:—Very few. I know, personally, of less than half a dozen, among 1400, that have the ear marks of hereditary disease.

Mr. F. P. Schoonmaker, City Solicitor of Bradford, here favored the Convention with the following interesting paper, "The Administration of the Poor Laws of Pennsylvania," which was received with applause:

ADMINISTRATION OF PENNSYLVANIA POOR LAWS.

I doubt whether I should undertake to discuss this subject before an assembly constituted as this one, of persons trained and experienced in the actual workings of the Pennsylvania Poor Laws. You are doubtless much more familiar with this subject than I am. You consider and deliberate upon these questions daily. My attention is called to them only semi-occasionally when some question is up for consideration as to the removal of a pauper having a settlement in another district or as to securing the property of some poor charge.

However, your honored President is a friend of mine, and when he stated that I was to address you upon this subject I could not resist him. I consented, too, with an easier feeling in my mind when your President told me of the kindly audience that I would face. Accustomed, as you are, to looking at persons and things from a charitable point of view I hope that you will view my effort from that point.

In reading the Poor Laws of Pennsylvania and considering the very numerous decisions of the courts in regard thereto I was early impressed with the idea that the Pennsylvania Poor System was so very complex as to need a great volume of court interpretation to read the law aright; but when one delves more deeply he finds that the general purpose of the Poor Laws is very simple indeed, that of caring for those unable to care for themselves, and that the great mass of poor litigation clogging the law books arises, in a great measure, over the contests between different poor districts as to the removal and settlement of paupers.

The Settlement Laws have by late Act of Assembly been so changed that a bona fide residence in a given district for one year constitutes a settlement. This, I believe, is a move in the right direction. I never could see the sense in the seven or eight kinds of settlements for poor relief, provided for in the Act of 1836. I even believe that the law should have gone further and put a stop to all the fuss about settlements. In my judgment the district where the person is at the time the first necessity for relief arises should bear the burden of the care of such person. The resultant cost would not, in my opinion, be greater for any given district than it is now, for I venture to assert that, owing to the migratory character of our people, the general result would be about the same. There is no district now but that is called upon frequently to pay for poor relief by another district where the applicant at the time of needing relief had not been living for the statutory year in such district, and vice versa, where the first district is now receiving from some other district about an equal amount of money expended in relief for persons legally settled in that other district. Abolish, then, the one year rule and you would expend no greater amount of money for poor relief, but would save the money now spent in serving notices, investigations as to settlement and litigation frequently arising in disputed cases.

If the settlement rule is abolished the law should also make it a misdemeanor to send an impending pauper out of the district. I am sorry to assert that even now there are cases where overseers of a given district have tried to lose an impending pauper by sending him into another district. Then, too, the time of our overseers, instead of being taken up in investigations and petty squabbles over settlements, could be devoted to the more worthy object of relieving the poor and distressed.

The sole aim and purpose of the Poor Laws are the care of those unable to care for themselves, either through lack of work, accident or disease. How is the purpose of the law to be fulfilled? Those entitled to poor relief are defined by statute: "It shall be the duty of the overseers of every district, from time to time, to provide * * * * * * * * for every poor person within the district, who shall apply for relief." Sec. 1, Act of June 18, 1836.

By the 6th Section of the same Act, no person can legally require assistance from the poor district who has not obtained a relief order from two justices. (This section is now amended so that the relief order is issued by one Justice, Act of 1905). Formerly the overseers could grant no relief until this relief order issued, but by recent act, relief may be granted without the formality of such relief order, and I think it is time that we repealed the entire provisions of the statute as to relief orders, for surely the question of whether relief should or should not be granted in a particular case is better left to the judgment and discretion of the poor overseers, who are usually better qualified by training and experience to pass judgment on that question than one or two Justices of the Peace, who perfunctorily pass an ex parte judgment without opportunity or inclination to give such a case the investigation which it needs. The present statute authorizing the overseers to grant relief without a relief order does not go far enough. The mandatory provisions of the statute should be repealed and the whole matter left to the overseers, with power on the part of any one to appeal to the courts if a proper subject for relief has been refused relief.

Now, if you have before you the proper subject of relief, how is that relief to be granted? The statute is largely silent as to the manner of granting relief. It authorizes the constructing of poor houses in which to care for paupers, and provides: "If such poor person be able to work, but cannot find employment, it shall be the duty of the overseers to provide work for him, according to his ability, and for this purpose they shall secure suitable places and a sufficient stock of materials." Sec. III., Act of June 18, 1836, P. L. 541.

"If such poor person by reason of age, disease, infirmity or other disability, be unable to work, it shall be the duty of the overseers to provide him with the necessary means of subsistence." Sec. 4, same Act.

The evident purpose of the foregoing statute is to provide work for those who are not able to work, to the end that pauperism be discouraged. How can this best be done? At the poor houses, or privately by weekly stipend?

The statute has said who shall be entitled to relief, but has very little to say as to how this relief be accomplished. The statute says: "Find work for the poor charge." How should you do it? How can you do it? It would be impracticable to take an applicant for poor relief to a certain shop and say to the owner of that shop: "Put this man to work." But it would be well for the overseers to keep in touch with the places where men are employed, so that if workmen are needed they may be supplied by applicants for poor relief, if of sufficient ability to work. The only real practical way in my judgment to provide work is at some public institution where those able to work may be given something to do, having in view always some outside employment for such of them as are from time to time able to undertake it.

Having in view the evident purpose of the statute to discourage pauperism, private relief should be discouraged, except in cases of temporary necessity arising from lack of work, sickness, accident or quarantine regulations. The general applicant for poor relief should be compelled to be cared for at a public institution. Many people will accept private aid when they can secure it without notoriety, when they would rather get out and work than make public acknowledgment of, their inability to take care of themselves by becoming an inmate of a public institution. Outdoor relief should not be granted without a thorough preliminary investigation, nor continued without close scrutiny from time to time as the absolute necessity for such continuance.

A person can draw a weekly stipend privately from the Poor Fund without their neighbors generally being aware that they are a public charge. Yet these same persons would be ashamed to be cared for at a public institution and would exert proper efforts to secure a means of livelihood themselves, if informed by the overseers that relief could only be administered at the public institution provided for that purpose.

Walter Bowditch, of Germantown, next read the following Paper,

"Almshouse Amusements, Character and Frequency of Them."

Received with applause.

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen of the Convention:

I have been called upon by the Association to read a paper on the subject of "Amusements, Character and Frequency of Them." Our Institution, that is, the Germantown Almshouse, which I have the pleasure of representing here in this Convention, of the Directors of the Poor of our State, has always taken a great interest in the furnishing of amusements for the inmates, particularly during the long winter evenings, the character of which varies according to the talent that we are able to secure, which is always furnished to our institution free of any expense, by the many organizations in our vicinity.

One of the many amusements that always pleases our people is the graphaphone, which they certainly enjoy to the full measure. It seems to give them a new lease of life to hear the different kinds of music, such as band selections, comic songs, recitations, and, in fact, a little of everything that is reproduced by a graphaphone. This form of entertainment is not only amusing but instructive, and I repeat that I know of no amusement that more thoroughly pleases the people in our Institution than the graphaphone. We furnish this music about twice a week, sometimes oftener.

The Christian Endeavor Societies of the different churches, also give our people entertainment of various kinds, such as readings, recitations, slight-of-hand performances, singing, etc., and generally wind up with a gastronomic treat to all, consisting of ice cream, cakes and candies. These occur about four or five times during the winter.

Once a year our Board of Directors makes an appropriation of $25.00 for the entertainment of our inmates. This takes place during the month of July, and the sum so appropriated is expended in giving a picnic to our people; for instance, a trip to Willow Grove Park and a substantial lunch, and I can assure you that this is enjoyed to the fullest extent by all who participate in the festivities.

Thus you see that the Directors of our Institution have in view the happiness as well as the comfort of the people, and carry into execution that which affords pleasure to the unfortunates for whom they have to care and try to make them feel that life even in its saddest phases is not a failure.

I have now given you a brief idea of just how the inmates of our Germantown Almshouse are entertained by the Directors and the Superintendent, and others connected with the Institution, all of whom take genuine pleasure in giving these entertainments to our inmates.

I thank you very kindly for your interest and I hope that I have suggested some little thought, that you may take away with you to your several Institutions, to help smooth the way for those whom you have under your official care.

President Boyne:—I never knew anyone to go crazy having a little fun. Fun is a good thing.

A discussion on the advisability of changing the name of the Association so as to include Corrective work of the State, and call it:

"THE ASSOCIATION OF CHARITIES AND CORRECTIONS"

was led by Mr. Fred Fuller, of Scranton, who said:

You have me down here for a speech, but this was not my subject at all. The Committee notified me of an entirely different subject than is printed here. It reminds me of the time when I was in school and a public exhibition was about to take place for examination. Of course my teacher, a lady, assigned me certain subjects. I prepared myself on the subject assigned, and exhausted it; and before a large assembly I was called out and began to be questioned by my teacher on a subject I never had heard of.

That is about my condition today on this subject. Mr. Colborn notified me that I was to prepare myself to give the statistics of appropriations of the State of Pennsylvania for the care of children. If you can identify that subject with this I will go ahead.

A boy was called up by his teacher to be flogged and the teacher commenced to flog him and he commenced to laugh and the teacher flogged him all the more severely and he kept on laughing harder than ever and the teacher says: "What are you laughing about?" and he says: "I have a good joke on you; you are licking the wrong boy." (Laughter.)

I don't know whether it was Shakspere who said:

"Who steals my purse steals trash
* * * But he that filches from me my good name,
Robs me of that which not enriches him,
And makes me poor indeed."

Now the idea of changing the name of this Association. You know this Association was christened thirty-five years ago. If we have due respect for the memory of the dead and for those who are living, who organized this Association under this title we should not think of changing its name. I have the authority of Mr. Colborn that we are known, under this name, all over the world, and all the world is clamoring for our Reports. Now we are broad enough to embrace any subject (I know Colborn can embrace any subject that presents herself to him) and I don't believing in changing the name of this Association except in case of marriage of course. If the Department of Charities and Corrections wants to marry us, all right. We are not going to marry them. We have built up all our reputation and character under the name we have. If you want to take in the Department of Charities and Corrections, all right. I would suggest the name of The Association of the Directors of the Poor and Charities and Corrections of Pennsylvania.

And now as to the subject that was assigned to me. It is a great subject but a dry subject. When I read this list of the appropriations that the State has so liberally given to every Department in the care and interest of children I think you will be interested. These are the appropriations as actually approved by the Governor.

Mr. Fuller here read the following List of Appropriations:

Compiled by Fred K. Fuller.

Mr. A. P. Childs, of Luzerne, here introduced and read the following Resolution:

"Whereas: Some of the delegates from Pennsylvania to the National Conference of Charities and Corrections recently held at Buffalo have united in a call for a Meeting in Harrisburg, December 6th next, of the representatives of the State and local charity and relief agencies and citizens interested in the work of such agencies, to consider the advisability of organizing a State conference of Charities and Corrections; and, whereas, the members of this organization recognize the necessity as well as the desirability of united action in this great field of work by all Societies and Associations of the State, therefore Resolved: That this Convention authorize and empower the President to appoint a committee of seven members to meet with the delegates of the late National Conference of Charities and Corrections and others acting with them, at the Harrisburg Conference, and to act for this Association in negotiations intended to establish a State Conference of Charities and Corrections to include the field of work of this Association and also the field of preventive and correctional work, under one form of organization; and to report at the next Meeting of this Association."

Col. E. P. Gould (Erie):—I move you that this Resolution be referred to the Committee on Resolutions, to report at this Convention so we may act upon it after that consideration and Report.

Mr. Chas. Snyder (Philadelphia):—I second Mr. Gould's motion.

Mr. Mackin:—I move as an amendment that the Committee report at the beginning of tomorrow morning's session.

After considerable discussion the motion of Col. Gould, with the amendment that the Committee report at tomorrow morning's Session, was unanimously adopted.

Upon motion the Convention here adjourned until 7:45 o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention met at 7:45 P. M. as per adjournment, and was called to order by President Boyne.

Prayer was offered by Rev. Perry, of the Episcopal church of Bradford.

President Boyne announced that Dr. Karl Kelsey was not present and introduced to the Convention Hon. Joseph W. Bouton, President Judge of the 48th Judicial District (who was received with applause) and addressed the Convention as follows, on the subject:

"SHALL CRIME INCREASE?"

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen:

I once heard a story to the effect that a certain minister found himself on a Sunday morning in the pulpit having forgotten his manuscript. He sent his boy to the house for it, and he said: "My dear people, I trust you will be patient. I have forgotten my manuscript, but have sent my son, who will bring it shortly." The boy returned with a book under his arm and said: "Father, mother couldn't find the manuscript, and so she sent the book from which you copied it." (Laughter.)

I fully realize tonight that procrastination is the thief of Time. When my good friend Mr. Boyne invited me to speak upon this occasion it was sometime ago and I have no apologies to make on account of not having had ample time in which to prepare myself, except that when I was too busy I could make no preparation, and when not too busy I was too tired; hence I find myself here tonight without either book or manuscript and I trust you will pardon me if my remarks seem ungrammatical or any quotations which I may attempt appear incorrect. No doubt there will be those in the room who can correct me.

A subject that has been much discussed; discussed from time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary is, whether the world is growing worse. It has been discussed pro and con. Those taking the affirmative, seeking to substantiate their position, produce statistics and figures showing that the numbers in the penitentiaries and in our penal institutions are increasing from year to year; while on the other hand those who take the negative say that that is true, but they explain by saying that when we consider the great influx of ignorant foreigners to our shores and the natural increase of population, that the proportion of evil doing is less than it has been formerly. I am not aware that this question has ever been settled, and unless the question be settled in the affirmative, in order that we might come to a realizing sense of the situation and do something to reduce the evil, then all of this discussion is of about as much avail as the fight now going on between Perry and Cook as to who discovered the north pole, or the question as to whether Bacon Shakspere wrote the work that is attributed to the latter.

A question of much more importance is the one which is made the subject of the few rambling remarks with which I have been invited to bore you tonight, namely, "Shall crime decrease?"

This may seem a singular question and one which everyone would say may be readily answered. You would all say that that question should be answered in the affirmative, but after all, an affirmative answer to the question is merely an expression of your wishes upon the subject, and your wish will not be realized unless something be done to bring it about, and the question is, how shall that be done? It is up to you and to me and to every citizen of the Commonwealth. Crime will decrease if we, as true American citizens, do our best to bring about that end. I am not here as a politician or to make a political speech, and I trust you will not put me down as a moralist. I am here in neither capacity, but I want to say one thing in regard to politics. We do not pay enough attention to politics; not that we do not familiarize ourselves with the platform of the party with which we are affiliated, or with the policy of that party, but we fail to familiarize ourselves with the character of the particular candidates who are put forth by that party for our suffrages. That is where we fail in politics.

You may think this question is remote from my subject, but I will tell you what it has to do with the subject. How many men today in our State who have occupied responsible political positions are languishing behind prison walls? How many more have gone unwhipped of justice? Who is to blame? We are the ones to blame, because we have not familiarized ourselves with the character of those men before placing them in positions of responsibility. Many a man, through weakness, unable to stand temptation, who had a good reputation, has been placed in a position of responsibility where the temptation was too strong for him, and has fallen and become a criminal.

Did you ever stop to think what the consequences may be if we fail to familiarize ourselves with the character of the candidate we are asked to vote for, taking it for granted that any man that the party puts forth must be immaculate? If we fail to know the kind of a man we vote for, or worse, if knowing him to be a man not of integrity, we cast our vote for him and elect him, and he becomes a criminal, how near do we come to being accessories to his crime? That kind of men are not the kind of men we want in public office. We want honest, God-fearing men, truth and justice-loving men; men who dare to stand up for the right and to condemn what is wrong. Who, placing principles above party, dare to do right in all places and upon all occasions.

As Holland said:

"God gives men, the time demands
Strong minds, great hearts, true faith and willing hands;
Men who the lust of office cannot kill,
Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy;
Men who possess opinions and a will,
Men who have honor, men who will not lie;
Men who can stand before a demagogue
And damn his treacherous flatteries without winking;
Tall men, sun-crowned, who live above the fog,
In public duty and in private thinking."

That is the kind of men we want; and when we get such men in public office it has its influence upon all others and helps to reduce crime in the higher places as well as among the lowly.

Too many are apt to think that this matter depends entirely on the courts. The courts can only enforce the law as the cases are brought before them. It is the duty of every citizen to see that crime committed —no matter by whom—is not to go unpunished. and when I speak of punishment I do not mean punishment in a vindicative sense or its severest sense, but that every man who commits a crime, no matter how small, shall be brought to answer for it. In many of our cities crime is left unpunished. There are persons who, perhaps through political influence, are suffered to commit small crime; to engage in a business that is contrary to law and contrary to public morals and public decency, because to interfere with them would be to interfere with politics. Some body would suffer from a political standpoint and they are also permitted to go on and on with their illegal business, because to interfere with them might perhaps lessen the profits of merchants and others who make a profit by supplying that class of people with their wares.

And again, we are apt to say that when a man of prominence commits a little depredation, a small offense against the law, that it is only a mistake and that we ought to overlook it, while on the other hand if some person occupying not so prominent a position commits an offense that he should be punished. It is the little faults that, allowed to go unpunished, grow into larger ones and finally become crimes.

Shakspere says: "If little faults, proceeding from distemper, shall not be winked at, how shall we stretch our eye when capital crimes, chewed, swallowed and digested, appear before us."

And Pope says:

"Vice is a monster of such hideous mien
That to be hated needs but to be seen;
But seen too often, familiar with its face
We first endure, then pity, then embrace."

It is the small faults that ought to be checked, that they may not grow and grow until the offender finally becomes a criminal. Knowing that he is immune from the smaller vice he will presume that he is immune from the larger.

A man who occupies an exalted position in society is deserving of greater punishment when he offends the law than the man who lacks education and knowledge and is ignorant of the law.

I was in court in one of the counties of this State where a man had been convicted of selling liquor without a license. It appeared that in one of the townships there was a certain prohibitory law. A Fair was being conducted there and this man, a man of intelligence and education, had deliberately rented some ground on the fair grounds and engaged in the sale of liquor in a tent there. He was tried and convicted, and to my astonishment nearly every lawyer in that County volunteered to make a speech in his behalf. Several Hungarians had been convicted at the same term of court; but no one volunteered to speak for them. The Judge gave this offender the extreme penalty of the law, remarking that the offense, when committed by him, was greater than when committed by ignorant people. If anyone deserves the extreme penalty it is such a man.

In relation to penalties you have often heard the expression "Justice tempered with mercy." There is no such thing as justice tempered with mercy. Deserved punishment tempered with mercy is justice, and it cannot be justice unless tempered with mercy. No matter what the offense, no matter what the penalty be for that offense, unless the punishment be tempered with mercy it is not justice.

Now this is a subject which might properly embrace a series of lectures which would occupy weeks. There is room for dozens of lectures upon this subject, but not having made preparation—and I know you are glad I have not—I will only notice a few of the questions that pertain to this subject.

Charity is a matter that has to do very largely with my subject. Charity can do more to decrease crime than any one thing that I know of. You may place prisoners in the penitentiary—and the term "penitentiary" is a misnomer—it is supposed to be a place for penitence, but I fail to know where many have really become penitent and reformed. The feeling of a man who goes to the penitentiary is that he is an outlaw and can never amount to anything thereafter.

This question of Charity is the subject that is uppermost in my mind. The Great Lawgiver said: "When thou makest a dinner or a supper call not thy friends nor thy brethren, neither thy kinsmen nor thy rich neighbors, lest they also bid thee again and a recompense be made thee, but call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind."

Too apt are we when we make a dinner to call our rich neighbor, expecting that we may also be bidden, but how few of us call the poor, the maimed, the lame and the blind. You would think it strange, perhaps, if some of the wealthy people in this vicinity should make a dinner and call the poor and the maimed and the lame and the blind, knowing of course that the recompense would not be in this world, but if they would realize that the recompense would be upon the resurrection day perhaps that is the kind of a dinner they would make. How many men are there if they meet a man in rags and tatters and he asks for a dime will at once give it to him without question, but will rather look at him and undertake to read his inmost soul and try to ascertain for themselves whether or not he be worthy and pass him by, saying: "If I only knew that he was worthy I would gladly give him the dime." Better give a dollar to ninety and nine unworthy ones than to refuse a dime to one in need who is worthy. The blessing is not because of the fact that the object of your bounty is worthy, but it lies in the spirit in which it is given.

Do you realize how much we can do to decrease crime? A poor wanderer, with no money and perhaps with an invalid wife and a family of starving children goes out to beg a few pennies with which to buy bread, and the first man he meets walks by, thinking in his own heart, "I wonder if he is worthy." He meets another who refuses to give him the dime that is necessary to keep the wolf from the door. I say again, better give a dollar to ninety and nine unworthy ones than to refuse the dime to the one who is worthy. What is the result? He fails to get aid, his family in hunger, the necessity of the occasion compels him to steal in order that his family may not starve, something that he otherwise perhaps would not do, and whose fault is it? Is it his fault, and should he be punished? No, it is the fault of you and I.

Charity does not consist alone in the giving of money or goods or things of value, but there is another kind of charity far above that kind. It costs you nothing, doesn't take a cent out of your pocket, does not impoverish you but makes the recipient richer by far. You see a man and the world has gone against him; he is down at the mouth; he thinks his friends have all left him; he is disheartened and thinks the only thing left for him is to join the lower class and become a criminal. As he toils up the hill with his weary load who is there to assist him? No one. You know how easy it is when a man is down to give him a kick rather than to raise him up. How natural it is. All that he needs is a cheery word; all that he needs is a little moral help, a little kindness, and that little will help to brace him up and may prevent him from becoming degraded and from committing crime.

Somebody wrote, years ago, a little poem which I have never forgotten, and which always seemed to me to be a sermon in and of itself:

"When you see a man in woe
Walk right up and say, Hello!
Say Hello, and how do you do!
How's the world been using you?
Slap the fellow on the back,
Bring your hand down with a whack,
Waltz straight up and don't go slow,
Shake his hand and say, Hello!

Is he clothed in rags? Ho! Ho!
Walk right up and say, Hello!
Rags are but a cotton roll,
Just for wrapping up a soul,
And the soul is worth a true
Hale and hearty, How do you do?
Don't wait for the crowd to go,
But walk right up and say, Hello!

Large vessels when they meet, they say,
They salute and sail away,
Just the same as you and me,
Lonely ships upon the sea,
Each one traveling his own jog,
To the port beyond the fog.
Let your speaking trumpet blow,
Raise your horn and say, Hello!

Say Hello! how do you do!
Other folks are good as you.
When you wander far away,
When you leave your house of clay,
When you travel through that strange
Land far beyond the range,
Then the souls you've cheered will know
Who you are and say "Hello!"

If ever an eloquent sermon was preached it was preached in those few lines. It covers the whole subject of charity almost, and if we would live up to the precepts of that sermon we would be better men and women.

Now this question of the children—and I do not undertake to tell anyone how to bring up their children—but I think it was Sam Jones, perhaps, who said: "There is little Johnnie. He comes home and goes into the house and walks into the parlor and mother says, 'Johnny, get out of here, you will spoil that rug,' and he goes into the sitting room and someone says, 'Johnny, your feet are dirty, don't sit down on that lounge,' and the boy goes down town and in the middle of the night a noise is heard and they open the door and Johnnie falls in on the floor and two forms are seen sneaking away in the darkness, and Mr. Jones says: 'If I had the best of furniture in my house and it was too good for my boy I would take an axe and chop it up and use it for firewood.'" That was also an excellent sermon on the question of rearing your own children. But let us talk about the children that do not belong to you and to me as natural parents. The children who have no natural parents worthy of the name. The children who are walking the streets; whose fathers are drunkards and whose mothers are still worse; who have no home, and who subsist on charity, living from the crumbs that fall from the tables of the more opulent, and who find it necessary finally to commit a petty theft, and not being caught, and becoming bolder, finally become before reaching majority, hardened criminals, when they might under different circumstances have grown up honored and respected citizens.

What is the remedy? We want legislation that will give us homes for these children. We want homes and schools, where these children may be taught and trained in the same manner as they ought to be by natural parents.

Applause.

We have men who give thousands upon thousands of dollars to churches—and it is a laudable cause—who endow libraries, also a laudable cause, but what we want is men who will recognize that institutions of this kind are far beter for the present and the coming generations than free Libraries. More good can be done by the endowment of Homes and Schools for these boys and girls than in the establishment of Public Libraries, although I am not here to say that a Public Library is is not proper and commendable. We need legislation that will establish as many of these places as are necessarw in order to take care of the children, no matter whether it be twenty, or a hundred, or a thousand, in the State.

Applause.

If we had those our work-houses and penitentiaries, in a few years, would not be crowded. "As the twig is bent the tree's inclined." If you can keep the boy right you will make the right kind of a man of him, but if he is allowed to go wrong in his youth you cannot straighten him up in later years without great difficulty. No one ever suddenly became wicked and no one ever suddenly became good. That is my doctrine. You have in this City, under the auspices of some of the best citizens, an institution of that kind which I understand subsists entirely upon charity. If you cannot get it by charity let us have a law that will compel the erection of these Homes. The man who leaves to his memory an institution of that kind has left more than riches to his heirs; left more than a pile of granite to his memory. When he dies he may not have a great monument of marble or granite erected to his memory, neither may those others of whom I have spoken—those that have exercised the kind of charity that I have said is pre-eminent. They may not leave a magnificent monument to adorn their graves, but there will be a monument erected, a monument erected by forms unseen, of such magnificent proportions that its pinnacle shall kiss the cloud; a monument around whose shaft will entwine the ivy of Love and at whose base will grow the roses of Faith, Hope and Charity, the fragrance of which by whomsoever breathed will be a stimulant and an inspiration to higher and nobler deeds. A monument whose inscription needs not the skill of mortal poet to write or mortal sculptor to carve, but away up towards its top, upon its shining snow-white surface, so near the top that it may be read by the saints above, in letters of shining light, the light which radiates from the Great White Throne, by angel fingers will be traced "inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren ye have done it unto Me." I thank you for your attention.

Applause.

Following the able address of Judge Bouton, Dr. J. Lewis Shrodes, Superintendent of the Insane Hospital at Woodville, Pa., read the following paper, "Progress in the Care of the Insane," which was received with applause. Following the reading of the paper Dr. Shrodes gave an interesting and instructive illustration of the condition of the brain of epileptics, and in cases of softening of the brain, etc., showing how in certain conditions, portions of the brain had become diseased and wasted away, and explaining why in such cases operations were impossible. This was illustrated with lantern slides, and was very instructive and interesting. The Paper was as follows:

PROGRESS IN CARE OF THE INSANE.

The advance in the care of the Insane has been "Para Passu" with the socialistic evolution of modern society. It must be remembered that we have to compare the present condition of the mass of the population not with their state under some ideal organization of society but with their actual condition in the past. And the early history of the care of the Insane is not conducive to the pleasure of an audience whose object is the betterment of all mankind.

The spirit of local pride will be pardoned in citizens of Bradford when I quote from the transactions of the Medical Society of the State of Pennsylvania for the year 1888, in which your neighbor, the late Dr. Curwen, said in reference to a report submitted by a committee of the Medical Society.

Dr. John Curwen of Warren, said:

"I would call attention to two points in this address. In the first place, a committee appointed twenty-five years ago by this Society reported in favor of a number of institutions throughout the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania for the care and treatment of the Insane. Sometime afterward the institution at Danville was established, and then Warren and next Norristown. This Society has been earnest in its efforts to have the necessary institutions established, but other things have interfered.

"A word in relation to one other point—the care of insane criminals. In 1870, I think, an effort was made in favor of hospitals for the care of insane criminals. A committee was appointed for that purpose, and a bill was presented to the Legislature. The Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means put it in his pocket, and that was the end of it. In 1873 the matter was again brought up, and gave rise to a good deal of contention. A resolution passed the Legislature appointing a committee to investigate the condition of insane criminals, and to report on the proper mode of treatment, and the construction of a hospital. A plan was drawn up, and a report presented. This was placed in the hands of the Committee on Legislation, and the Chairman pocketed that bill. The next year it was again introduced, and again pocketed. There we stand. It is not the fault of this Society. It requires pushing in other directions to have the matter set right."

If the spirit of Dr. Curwen is with us today we can see that the influence in those directions has been secured and Pennsylvania has added several State Hospitals and a number of County Hospitals to the list of which she has no reason to be ashamed.

This has been the result of a gradual growth from the crude methods which obtained in the past, and is in harmony with and a sequence of the general social evolution, the loss of self, the sacrifice of the individual for the general good, has been its active feature. Many of us have been engaged in the work long enough to view the remains of exploded theories and in some instances have over-reached the mark, yet the general result has been an improvement in the conditions which existed in the past.

The cry for help in the past was not intended entirely for the victim of insanity. To a great degree it was a desire to be relieved of the responsibility for his care, and the custodial asylum followed as a natural result. Very little thought was given to the individual as soon as the community had been relieved of his presence and care. Should we wonder that the impressions of our youth have left us with a horror of what was literally a living death.

But we have lived to learn that the human mind diseased is the human mind still and the approach of insanity does not mark the appearance of a new entity or new force. The old entity or the old force simply goes astray. The common expression that every one is insane on some point or other is silly and untrue. Sanity is the condition of the great bulk of mankind; but the impulse, the mood, the failure of judgment, the lack of coherent thought—the various symptoms which constitute the chaos of disturbed intellection find their counterparts, or rather their germs, in every healthy mind. So long as these impulses, moods, etc., can be dominated by the will of the individual, just so long are they simply the weakness of humanity, but when the will of the individual is powerless before them then is that individual insane.

The necessity of the custodial asylum for the Insane in the past proved to be the corner stone of the present Hospitals for the same class, and the present Hospitals are now developing the Psychopathic Hospitals of the future.

The idea that the care and treatment of the Insane is largely a medical problem now dominates the policies which are followed in the extension of the State's attitude toward the Insane. The Pathalogical Laboratory is now a necessary adjunct to every well equipped Hospital for the Insane. These Laboratories are yielding a harvest of information and while they have not yet produced a cure for insanity any more than they ever produced a cure for typhoid fever, their signboards of progress clearly indicate the direction toward its prevention. The future must indicate the distance to the desired goal. Boards of Trustees of State Institutions and Directors of the Poor having charge of Hospitals for the Insane are awake to the necessity of making provision for skilled medical care and treatment for the patient of the present just as much as they were in figuring out the number of bushels of beans and potatoes it took to keep a certain number of victims from starving to death in the past.

The methods of administration employed in the modern Hospitals furnish a theme of never-ending discussion and contention and was far from settled when the Legislature enacted a law that the Superintendent should be a physician of experience, for immediately following this law and up to the present moment we hear the despairing wail that even though we must tolerate a physician as Superintendent, we should have someone to manage the business. And this in face of the fact that the doctors are nearly all married men and their wives run the business and keep a watchful eye on the doctor while they are doing it.

The trained executive medical officer is as necessary to the modern hospital as the oculist surgeon or gynecologist and I verily believe that the future will prove that most of the troubles that beset all classes of hospitals are due to the fact that the medical management is inadequate. This does not mean that we do not have excellent physicians or skillful surgeons, but rather that young men coming into the profession from year to year lack in hospital training, the amphitheatre or surgical clinic comprising the extent of their field of observation during their entire course. It has been the custom in almost all our hospitals to ask the recent graduate to serve a year for the experience he gets, and at the same time pay thirty-five or forty-five dollars per month to the man who drives the ambulance.

The cottage system in Hospital construction affords excellent opportunities for classifying our Insane. And medical care is simplified by placing them in charge of recent graduates, who in turn report to a central medical executive and thereby applying those methods that prevail in all affairs that keep in step with the progress of modern times. The State of Pennsylvania is expending enormous sums of money in the care of her Insane. And pennsylvania is not alone in this line of endeavor, for in almost every State we hear the people speak of their institutions of this kind with no small degree of pride. And in answer to the accusations that the expenditures by the Government and States for the support of these Hospitals has been unwise, we need only to point to the success attained in the prevention of disease. It would be impossible to compute the loss to the public due to epidemics of Typhoid Fever, Diphtheria, Smallpox, Scarlet Fever, Tuberculosis and other acute diseases that have been the scourges of the past.

The control, or rather the prevention, of these has been in a great measure due to the research and pathological work done in our Hospitals and to demonstrate that our Hospitals for the Insane are giving a good account of themselves in this direction, I will ask your indulgence while presenting some plates of specimens of Brain Pathology.

No. 1. These plates are photographic reproductions of specimens from the collection obtained at the Government Asylum at Washington, and represent the changes that actually occur in the brains of those who die insane. This plate I present for the purpose of showing the shape and appearance of the normal brain and with the exception of some slight venous engorgement is about normal.

No. 2. In contrast with it is this one in which extreme cerebral atrophy has occurred. In the first you will observe the convolutions of the brain well rounded and the symetrical appearance of the brain preserved, and in the second the shrunken convolutions showing clearly the appearance of atrophy.

No. 3. This is a view of the brain in a case of meningitis of childhood with arrest of development of the brain placed with a brain of normal size and weight. I will not attempt to give the anatomical description of these views, for the very good reason that I am certain it would prove very tiresome to most persons, and we should be democratic enough to believe in the greatest good to the greatest number.

No. 4. We are all more or less familiar with the expression "softening of the brain" and physicians are often urged to open the skull of those who are mentally affected for the purpose of removing points of pressure and hemorrhagic spots supposed to exist therein.

No. 5. Here is a view in which we have a condition that presents a train of symptoms entirely different from those you find in softening, and many cases are recorded of successful operations for tumor in the brain.

No. 6. Three or four cases have come under my observation recently in which the skulls of patients have been trephined with the hope of curing them of mental disease, in which there existed paralysis in one case and in the others only those symptoms of well advanced sclerotic conditions.

No. 7. The epileptic must not be overlooked in our study of these conditions and though this view only indicates a sclerotic condition it is to be hoped that future research work will develop some relief for this terrible affliction.

Dr. H. H. Hart, of New York, Member of the Russel Sage Foundation Fund, was next introduced by President Boyne, and was received with applause, and addressed the Convention as follows:

CHILD CARING WORK OR THE UNITY OF CHILD HELPING WORK.

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen:

After this very full and interesting program I shall not occupy your time at any considerable length. In 15 minutes I shall be through. This Conference, which is the oldest Conference of Charities in the United States, stands for something. It stands for what I believe to be the most important thing in the whole field of philanthropy and charity. It stands for the intelligent study of the problems involved in dealing with the insane, the poor and the dependent.

During the past year and a half, in the service of the Russel Sage Foundation, I have been making a special study of the work of the care of dependent and delinquent children in six States, one of which is Pennsylvania. The State of Pennsylvania was one of the Pioneer States in the modern method of caring for children. Through the Children's Aid Society your State, many years ago, adopted the method of using the family Home. The Western Pennsylvania Children's Aid Society followed the same method, in a unique manner, because it avails itself for the work of the volunteer beyond any Society I know of in the world, with the assistance of a single paid officer in the City of Pittsburg, and the Allegheny Society also employs a paid officer.

In your State this work is more difficult than it is in any other State with which I am familiar. The work of the Pennsylvania Children's Aid Society ranks with the best work that is being done for children in the United States.

Take your work for delinquent children—your institution at Glen Mills and the Girls' House of Refuge rank among the very best in the United States. Your institution at Morganza is coming to the front. It is improving in its methods of organization, and bids fair to ultimately take rank with the older institutions.

Your work for defective children, especially for the feeble-minded, has for many years ranked among the best organized Institutions in the world.

Pennsylvania is developing the Juvenile Court, which is becoming very valuable in this work. You gentlemen perhaps know the situation here better than I do. You have two ends of this State that are almost like separate Commonwealths. In the eastern end the Counties work largely through the Children's Aid Society. The Counties provide the funds for the Society to board children out in family homes.

It also makes an allowance for their clothing. There is an allowance for watching over the children after they are placed in homes, which is a most important part of the work. Now the thing that astonishes me is this, to find that although you give the Children's Aid an allowance as long as the child is boarding out, as soon as they get the child into a free home the allowance for supervision is stopped. When I first found this out I couldn't believe it. It seems to me as though you should say to the Society: "As long as you have this child in the boarding home we will make you an allowance of, say 25 cents a week, for supervision, but if you will get that child into a free home we will allow you fifty cents a week. I commend this to your careful consideration. I don't think I am mistaken in regard to the situation.

The same situation prevails to a considerable degree in the western part of the State. The Western Pennsylvania Children's Aid Society is doing a beautiful work. I employed a competent man, sometime ago, and sent him through the western counties, and by the courtesy of the officers of the western portion of the State he was allowed to visit children who were placed in homes, and they were nearly all well placed. But the time is coming when it is no longer practicable to do this work entirely by the aid of volunteers. I believe in the volunteer, and it is wonderful what has been accomplished in that way. There is an inequality in the efficiency of these Societies. Where the best work is done is where there is some woman who gives a large amount of her time and energy to the work. By and by that good woman's health begins to fail, or some other circumstance happens. Perhaps she dies, and the work falls upon some new person. That woman is carrying a great deal of valuable knowledge in her head. There ought to be perfect records kept, but it is exceedingly difficult to get them. I find that the people who are most efficient in execution are almost always deficient in making records. The facts that need to be known, to do the best for the child, are not available.

I think what ought to be done is to establish a co-operative system of visitation, whereby you will pay competent visitors to supplement the work of the volunteer. You will never perfect your work until you supplement it with this aid. There is an annual State appropriation of $12,500 distributed among the 23 County Childrens' Aid Societies. I learned of one county where there are 100,000 people and where the amount allowed from the State appropriation was $100 a year, and the Secretary of that Society said to a friend of mine: "We have a deficit this year of $3.50, and we don't know where it is coming from." The tendency is for people to say: "The State is supporting this and we don't need to do it." You must foster the liberality of the people where this work is being done.

These dependent children are cared for in some portions of the State by the Directors of the Poor. There is a great difference in the efficiency of the work as done by them. The general practice is not to re-elect the Directors of the Poor. It seems to be regarded as some thing that ought to be passed around, and when a man has served three years he is generally superceded by another man. I find that almost invariably the Records of these children are very imperfect. The Directors carry that knowledge largely in their minds, and the consequence is that when a change of Directors takes place the personal knowledge and interest that that man has in the children that he has placed is lost, and every once in a while the child is lost sight of, or his principal need is lost sight of. I don't think that the handling of this work, by the Directors of the Poor, with all their other work, is practical. I think that the plan of co-operation with the Children's Aid Society is a better plan. I would prefer a Public Agency, but you will have to go to New Jersey or Massachusetts to learn to run it.

The County unit isn't large enough. You can't employ a man or woman who can give his or her whole time to it.

It is coming to be recognized that this is an exceedingly technical work. That it needs wisdom in selecting homes. If you will examine the work being done in Philadelphia you will be interested in seeing the quality of the men and women put into that work, and the quality of the work they are doing. You have in the central part of the State a very interesting man—Prof. Emmert—he has, what seems to me, the most important idea in regard to children's work of anyone in Pennsylvania. He has the idea of creating an Endowment Fund of $25,000 for visitors for children placed out in private homes. I am watching that with great interest. This is the most important question you have to consider. The most difficult work you have to do, and the thing that makes most for staying the tide of pauperism and vice and crime.

I want to tell you of some of the encouraging things that look to the improvement of this work. One is the course of study about to be undertaken in Washington County, under the auspices of the women of Washington County. A series of lectures on this question.

One of the best things you can do is to make a detailed and faithful and careful study of this most important subject. I thank you.

Applause.

Upon motion the Convention here adjourned until tomorrow morning.

In the evening a most delightful reception was tendered to the delegates at the home of Hon. and Mrs. S. R. Dresser, under the auspices of the Children's Aid Society. Refreshments were served and an opportunity given to the delegates to enjoy this beautiful home, a treat that was appreciated by all.

PROCEEDINGS OF WEDNESDAY, OCT. 13th, 1909.

The Convention was called to order at 9 o'clock A. M. by President Boyne.

Rev. W. M. Courson, pastor of the Baptist Church of Bradford, offered prayer.

Dr. J. Lewis Srodes:—The committee held their meeting this morning and are ready to report on the Resolution offered yesterday, with the modification as suggested.

Mr. Srodes reads the resolution, as modified, as follows:

Whereas. The delegates from Pennsylvania to the National Conference of Charities and Corrections recently held at Buffalo have united in a call for a meeting in Harrisburg Dec. 6 next, of the representatives of the State and local charity and relief agencies and citizens interested in the work of such agencies, to consider the advisability of organizing a State Conference of Charities and Corrections, and

Whereas. The members of this organization recognize the necessity as well as the desirability of united action in this great field of work by all societies and associations of the State, therefore

Resolved. That this Convention authorizes and empowers the President to appoint a committee of several members to meet with the Pennsylvania Conference of Charities and Corrections at Harrisburg Dec. 6, 7 and 8, and to act for this Association in negotiating for the affiliation of the Association of the Directors of the Poor with the Pennsylvania Conference of Charities and Corrections and to report their recommendations at the next meeting of the Association.

Mr. Colborn moves that the Report of the Committee be received and the modified Resolution adopted.

Col. E. P. Gould:—It is a good deal of expense for delegates to go to Harrisburg and attend a Convention of that kind. Is there, accompanying this, an agreement that this Association is to pay the expenses. If there is we ought to cut the number down.

Mr. Smith (Chester):—I think three or five would do as good service as a Committee of seven. That large number is unweildy.

Dr. Srodes:—I think the members of this Association have enough interest in their work to take a large part of that expense upon themselves. They have been coming to these Conventions, at much greater expense, and some of them have been bearing their own expenses absolutely. As this will probably mark an epoch in this Association I rather feel like supporting the Resolution of seven members. I wouldn't care to take the responsibility with two others. It is too small a representation of a body like this. I don't think the expense will hurt this Association at all.

The motion of Mr. Colborn is carried and the modified Resolution is adopted.

D. A. Mackin, Chairman of the Committee on place of next Meeting, reported as follows:

"The Committee on place of Meeting unanimously recommend that the next Convention be held at Williamsport, Pa."

(Signed) Committee on Place of Meeting.

Upon motion the Report is adopted.

Col. E. P. Gould (Erie) moves that the Constitution of this Association be printed in the Report.

The Motion is agreed to.

Mr. Colborn: There is hardly a month passes that I am not called upon to give a list of the charitable institutions of the State. I have a complete list of them, and I would move that they, also, be printed in the next report, together with the names of officers.

The Motion of Mr. Colborn is agreed to.

Mr. John L. Smith (Chester) here read the following Paper:

"THE TREND OF OUT-DOOR RELIEF AND VAGRANCY."

The Paper was received with applause.

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen of this Convention:

I come before you at this time with a subject that is old. One that has been threshed over and over again until, I fear, those who have been in attendance at these Conventions in past years will hardly find much to interest them in what I have to say. But, hoping that those present who are new in the work may receive some benefit, I will try to revive this very important phase, or department of our work, namely, Out-door Relief, or the Care of the Poor. Outside of our County Homes the first and most important step is to be sure to select the right person to take charge of this work.

He should be God-fearing, intelligent, honest and kind. Fearless of man and firm as a rock. One who dares to do right because it is right, and one who will carefully, intelligently and patiently investigate all calls for relief. Our experience leads us to feel that many, yes, very many, calls come from the unworthy and undeserving. To help these is wrong—a wrong not only to the family and the applicant, but wrong to our constituents as well. These people are usually human leeches who suck their existence from the worthy members of society. They raise their families in ignorance, crime and pauperism. Far better to withhold the hand of charity in these cases, and to break up these families, if possible, and receive the members into the County Home, and then place the children in good Christian homes where, if they are normal children, they will in most cases be trained into good citizenship.

In this work we need the help of our good women. If, in your County, the women are not organized into Children's Aid Societies, do not lose any time in getting them to so organize, because their aid is invaluable. Particularly in the care of children you need the earnest, intelligent, sympathetic help of the best women of your community in this splendid work of caring for the unfortunate little ones, who are sure to come to you mutely, but none the less, certainly pleading for some of the comforts that belong to childhood, and at least a partial release from the unfortunate conditions into which they have been born, and a chance to grow into intelligent, useful men and women. Organize the good women of your County.

Place the children under their supervision. Then aid and encourage them in their work, and you will find that many of the boys and girls who come into their care, and who, otherwise, would grow into paupers and criminals, will lead good and useful lives as men and woman.

Now we come to the deserving poor, such as widows left with a family of children. These, and such as these, should be helped for a short time, at least. She should be visited and her confidence won, if possible. She should be led to see that her children would be better off if put into good homes, where they could be cared for better than she could care for them, and where they will learn to be useful. She should be helped by the Aid Society to find the right kind of homes for her children and some useful occupation for herself.

We help those best whom we help to help themselves. Idleness leads to vice and crime, while useful employment leads to happiness and prosperity.

Another class of deserving poor is the industrious working man who has met with misfortune through sickness or otherwise. He needs the kind and thoughtful helping hand and should be given it. He deserves special effort in his behalf, not only in the support of his family during his sickness but in the way of getting those of his children into useful employment who are old enough, under the Compulsory School law, to quit school and go to work. Help him and his family if possible into a better way of living than that to which they have been accustomed, and thus tide them over their trouble. Our experience leads us to believe that, as a rule, people who need aid are at fault themselves. Oh! if we could but put a good mother into every home, what a marvelous transformation would be wrought in this class of homes in less than a generation. And then, if in addition to this, we would but banish the rum traffic there would be few calls and little need for charity, for I am thoroughly persuaded that a careful study of this subject by an unprejudiced mind, will convince anyone that this is the cause of nearly all our crime and pauperism.

Again, I believe there is much real harm done by indiscriminate out-door relief. It has been found that in counties where much money has been spent in the past in outside relief that, when they changed their method and practically shut off outside relief, they had but few additions to the number under their care in the County Home.

Most of those who seek outside relief will not come to the County Home, but will live, and in many cases, live better without this aid than with it.

Many families continue paupers generation after generation when allowed to receive charity they do not deserve. Many good men and women permit their sympathy to get the better of their judgment and recommend individuals and families as proper objects of charity when it is entirely wrong for them to do so.

Allow me again, if you please, to urge that very great care be exercised in granting outside relief. To counties doing much of this work I would recommend that they reduce the amount they have been so distributing. I believe that to keep families of this class together is wrong, and only tends to multiply our dependent classes. Let us aim only to help those families to help themselves; aim to get the children away from these homes, out into homes of good farmers, where they will be taught to be useful, even if we have to pay a small amount for them for a time till they become self-supporting. Let us force, so far as possible, delinquent parents to fulfill their obligations to their offspring and to their fellow men. Let us aim more definitely to prevent pauperism and, as a result, I feel sure less will be required of us in the work of taking care of the needy.

Discussion on the subject is called for.

A Voice:—I understand you to say that many families remain paupers for generation after generation. Will you tell me how that is, if the children remain in the homes?

Mr. Smith:—By their improvident methods. The children will take after their parents, and will grow up as their parents did. If they are put into good homes the pauperism will cease.

A Voice:—I have known children in our County to remain right in the institution. Should that be allowed?

Mr. Smith:—Not under any circumstances. The law forbids and provides that a child shall not be kept in a County Home, after they are two years old, more than sixty days. In our County we always find a home for such a child.

Mrs. Berry (Bradford):—The law ought to be so it wouldn't take so much red tape to take children away from the parents. The ladies of the Children's Aid have a difficult problem to overcome.

Mr. Childs:—What amount of out-door relief do you extend to these deserving families?

Mr. Smith:—Outside of quarantined families and medical relief last year we spent $467.25. We don't have a single family that expects permanent relief.

If your family become needy we will find a good neighbor of yours and give them $10 or $20 and tell them to use it as judiciously as they can.

Mr. Childs:—Suppose you have a widow and several children, and she is a first-class woman, what do you do?

Mr. Smith:—We try to persuade her to put the children into the Home.

Mr. Childs: We don't. We try to have her bring up the children and not break up the family. I think the Poor Districts are putting too much on the Ladies' Aid Society, in not taking care of their own.

A voice:—You take a woman with four or five little children and you have to give her what is proper to keep her. I claim that the law gives the Directors the right to give what is necessary.

Mr. Smith:—In nine cases out of ten those children will grow up not self-supporting. But you put them into a good home and they become self-supporting and tax payers in after years. We believe it is not best to measure a case by the immediate expense. We are doing better work in our county than if we allowed the children to stay in the Home.

A Voice:—We ought to work in harmony with the Ladies' Aid Society. We are in a mining district, and we have a great many widows and orphans there. They come to the Directors of the Poor for out-door relief. We find it cheaper and easier to support them outside of the almshouse than in the almshouse. We find it is better and more humane not to separate a mother from her children. It is the duty of the Directors of the Poor to aid these dependent children.

Applause.

Mr. Smith:—No doubt of that, but we think we aid them best by turning them over to the Ladies' Aid Society. Of course there is a difference in localities. You are in a mining district; we are in a farming district. You cannot find homes for the children in the mining district as easily as we can in our County.

Mr. Barnhart (Fayette Co.):—This is an interesting question. All the way they will get me not to help support these children is to vote me out of office. Some of the Directors say: "We will not take care of these children," but they are God's children and should be taken care of. I never had a man who paid a big tax say that it wasn't right, but you come to the small taxpayer and they will find fault with us poor devils.

Our Ladies' Aid Society should have great credit for the work they are doing in our County, and our Directors are working in harmony with them.

Mr. Smith:—If you will come to Chester County I can assure you that you will find that we take care of our widows and children as well as any County in Pennsylvania.

Mr. Barnhart:—I don't mean to say that you do not. All I mean is that we should take good care of these children. All we want is to determine the right plan.

Mr. Brownmiller (Schuylkill County:—In our County, where we have 230,000 people, we pay as high as $42,000 a year for out-door relief. Last year the Commissioners cut us to $20,000. We have 600 people in the almshouse, with 99 in the Hospital and 109 in the Insane Department. It is a sad state of affairs.

Sometimes people ask for out-door relief when they do not need it. A woman will go to a store and say: "I want a woolen blanket. You charge up so much meat and bread." You have to be careful all the time not to be defrauded.

President Boyne:—A person who is kept warm can stand it without eating for sometime. Now wasn't that blanket as good to that woman as so much groceries? They have to keep warm as well as to eat. In our County we give them an order for shoes, and at the Poor Farm we keep them all clothed. It is as necessary to keep their feet warm as their belly full.

Mr. Brownmiller:—If people were all honest it would be all right. But we have a class of foreigners who live from hand to mouth, and we want to teach them to live differently. If they are out of work for two weeks they want the tax payers to support them. And when they get blankets they sell them and get beer and whisky.

Mr. Yost (Somerset):—I am not in favor of taking children away from their mother. It is a mistake, if the mother is able and a fit person to take care of them.

Mrs. Berry (Bradford):—The Directors of the Poor are all right, and the Children's Aid are all right. But in days gone by they didn't work together. The Directors of the Poor, every man of them, has business of his own. They cannot and do not give their personal attention to these cases that they ought to have. The ladies can give more of their time, and they can find out whether a woman needs blankets more than she needs bread. The men of the Poor Boards cannot give their time to this, but they should arrange some plan. They should have a man that they pay, to find out these things.

Mrs. Dickson:—In Westmoreland County the limit is $8 for out-door relief. They give an order on the store keeper and allow them just the necessities. They generally leave it to the store keeper to judge what is best.

As to the children. They don't keep children in the Home after they are two years old. Then they take them to the Children's Home in Greensburg, and pay to the Children's Aid $2 a month for the support of the child.

Mrs. Lydia B. Walton here presented the Report of the Children's Aid Society of Chester County, as follows:

The Report was received with applause.

REPORT OF CHESTER COUNTY CHILDREN'S AID SOCIETY.

We find at the close of our year's work there is cause for renewed hope, inspired by the faithfulness of our earnest, tireless workers. The Chester County Children's Aid Society was founded in 1884 and in 1891 a Charter was granted. The plan of our work is an oft-told tale before this Association and we will avoid repetition. Many of us have been active in this organization since its outset, and have grown gray in the service, but under the guidance of the Great Ruler of the Universe, who called us to this field of labor, we hope to so continue, doing what best wisdom directs towards the uplifting of our weak, defenseless boys and girls. We also trust through the exchange of thought, personal contact and silent waiting, we may better understand how to spread the right influence over those who are so dependable. In all these by-gone years the work of finding homes and fitting children into them, then the quiet tilling and seed planting, have been cheerfully and generally successfully performed. Garfield said "that he always felt like taking off his hat to a boy in a ragged coat when he thought of the responsibilities within." Our aim has been to make our young people upright, inright and outright. Time has brought us changes in our line of work. Many of our children have grown to men and women, and stand upon the threshold of untold responsibilities. The world with its many avenues of usefulness open before them. Some are in homes of their own, with families reared; some shopkeepers; others house-maids, thus pursuing various occupations. True, a few have failed to reach the standard hoped for and have drifted back into the old channels from whence we gathered them, but the greater per cent have rewarded our anxiety and toil. Also their kind, patient caretakers for their love, sympathy and service. It is well said: "If we save the children of today, we save the nation tomorrow."

The active membership of our Society at present is 205. Within the year 36 County wards have been added to our number. In free homes at present 140; in boarding homes, 36. As the older County children come to our care they are placed in free homes, receiving practical training. The little ones in boarding homes, but soon form part of the family life and enter into the affections of their caretakers, thus very frequently permanent homes are the outcome.

Our Directors of the Poor and Officials of our County Home have always extended their loyal co-operation in this work. With their humane, kindly feeling toward the indigent and helpless every true effort to uplift the dependent class meets with their hearty approval.

We are convinced no struggle for human betterment can be more important than child-saving, nor demands more thorough vigilance in its administration.

May God bless the children and the children's helpers everywhere.

Mrs. Alonzo P. Bowie, of Uniontown, read the following Report of the Children's Aid Society of Western Pennsylvania, which was received with applause:

Also the Report of the Children's Aid Society of Fayette County.

Also the Report from the Industrial School for Girls, at Indiana.

REPORT OF CHILDREN'S AID SOCIETY OF WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen:

After the remarks of one of the speakers last evening you may be surprised at my assurance in appearing before you, but realizing that Western Pennsylvania is still on the map, and trusting to the ladies of the McKean County Auxiliary to protect me from the wrath to come I venture to read the last annual report of the Children's Aid Society of Western Pennsylvania:

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen:

I have the honor to represent the Children's Aid Society of Western Pennsylvania and to read the report made at its last annual meeting.

Who or what is responsible for the fact that we have in our care nearly 1000 children, almost 500 having been received during the past year? Is it lack of parental love, is it the stress of modern life, is it the number of charitable organizations ready to care for the child? All three causes are probably contributary to the result. In former years, when people lived simply, ate plain food, and women wore calico, it was not so hard for a widow, left with half a dozen children, to keep them together. In fact, neither she nor the neighbors ever thought of anything else and everyone respected her efforts and gave her a helping hand. Of course she did almost literally "work her fingers to the bone," and probably wore herself out in the effort. But she succeeded in raising a family of honest, dutiful, industrious sons and daughters, many of whom have become steel kings and coal barons in later days. But in those days a mother was not left to work alone unless death had claimed husband and father. Men didn't then, as now, get tired of the struggle and disappear; nor were they sent to jail for "non-support" and allowed to loaf there in idleness while the mother or the community cared for their children. Nor did mothers, forgetful of faithful husband or helpless children, go off with a handsomer man, or at least a richer one, as, alas, occasionally happens now. But nowadays there are Children's Homes, Asylums, Orphanages, etc., on every side, ready and anxious to come to the rescue and relieve the forsaken one of all care and responsibility for his own offspring. Are they too ready and too anxious I wonder? Some people say, in criticism, that it really encourages vice—that it is too easy for an unmarried mother to get rid of her child. But is it better to let her drag it from place to place, feeble, underfed, until it sinks or is hurried into an unwept grave? The Children's Aid Society makes a sincere effort to keep families together, but in many cases home influence for good seems lacking and we find it necessary to remove the child entirely from its home in order to keep it off the streets or away from bad associations. Strangers seem to give better care and wiser training to Young America of the Twentieth Century than can mothers, worn out by hard work, constant hurry and the ever-harder struggle for daily bread. So on the whole we feel that we have a right to be what we claim to be, a Children's Aid Society. Our aim, as you hear each year, is a good home for every child, where he may become one of the family circle and receive the loving care and training which an unkind fate has denied him in the home into which he was born. It requires, often, great patience and several trials to find that ideal home and we sometimes fail in the end. But our good women willingly give the time, money and wisdom required. The Children's Aid Society of Western Pennsylvania is almost unique in its work, from the fact that it is all volunteer work. We have one paid worker, our actuary in the Pittsburg office, and for the last few years we have employed a Trust company to care for our money, as it was so difficult to find a woman willing to have the responsibility of handling such large amounts. But in all the twenty-three County Auxiliaries the work is the free-will offering of devoted women, many of whom have been more than twenty years in the service.

According to the annual report of the treasurer these children have been boarded (for longer or shorter periods), clothed, visited (once or many times) and in some cases buried, and the general work of the society carried on for about $21,000. Of this amount $6250 came as a State Apropriation, the remainder came in various ways, personal gifts, through entertainments, membership dues, board paid by friends and in many counties from the Dnrectors of the Poor for board and clothing of children legally committed. We realize that our accomplishment falls far short of our aim, but we feel that with no Children's Bureau, no Seybert Institute, no large bequests, and a State Appropriation very little larger than that received by one of the counties having an independent society, we have yet no reason to blush for our report.

Mrs. Alonzo P. Bowie, Uniontown, Pa., Delegate from Children's Aid Society of Western Pennsylvania.

We were told last year that on account of hard times we were apt to have many more children placed in our care; instead we had 13 more the preceding year. Our larger boys and girls give the most trouble, as it is hard to find employment, so as to keep them out of mischief—not having a Juvenile Court or schools in our County to assist us in caring for them. Our Judges are always kind and help us in our work whenever they can, and depend upon us when a boy or girl is brought before them, for us to give them a trial, under our care. Our County Officlais encourage us and tell us our work is satisfactory to them, and that they appreciate all we do for these helpless little ones, and are surprised that we do so much. We are in hopes that the day is near when we shall have a Temporary Home, and can look after the children better, as our boarding homes are in different parts of the town. We are thankful for and appreciate the assistance given us by the Directors of the Poor, Superintendent and Matron of County Home, our Attorney, the County Officials, as well as that of all our good friends.

Again thanking the friends of our Children's Aid Society for their assistance in the past, and trusting they will continue to give us encouragement this coming year.

MRS. HUGH L. RANKIN,
President.

MRS. ALONZO P. BOWIE,
Secretary.

Mrs. Willard wishes me to say that the Children's Aid Society Industrial School is in a flourishing condition. Various needed repairs have been made and a member of the State Board of Charities who went over the place a few weeks ago congratulated her upon its excellent condition. Our property there has tripled in value in the twelve years since we bought it.

We have room for eighteen girls and the school is usually full. Forty girls have been placed in homes during the year, sixty having been cared for at an expense of $1725.00

E. D. Sollenberger of Philadelphia here presented and read the following Report of the Children's Aid Society of Pennsylvania, which was received with applause.

Following the reading of the Report of the Children's Aid Society Mr. Sollenberger also read the Report of the White House Conference on the care of dependent children.

The two papers here follow:

REPORT OF THE CHILDREN'S AID SOCIETY OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Edwin D. Solenberger, General Secretary, 1506 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

A total of 1766 children were in the care of the Children's Aid Society of Pennsylvania during 1908. There remained in the care of the Society, at the close of the year, 1428 children. Of this number 615 were boarding in private families. Some of these are children whose parents are responsible for their partial suport, either under direct agreement or by order of Court, so that they cannot be given out for adoption or permanently placed in free homes. Others are children who must be boarded because their physical condition is such that desirable free homes cannot readily be found for them. A number of them are boarding temporarily until the right home is found, where the child will be taken as a member of the family and raised as an own child. The remaining 813 children whom we have in our care, in addition to the 615 who are boarding in private families, are all given exactly the same care and supervision. Many of them may become permanent members of the families in which they are placed, but they are subject to removal by the Society whenever the welfare of the child seems to demand it.

The extent to which the Children's Aid Society in Eastern Pennsylvania has become the authorized placing-out agent for various public and private institutions and societies is indicated by the fact that we received in the year 1908 a total of 394 children from such sources as the Directors of the Poor of various Counties, Department of Public Health and Charities of the City of Philadelphia, Juvenile Courts, Orphanages, Hospitals, Churches, as well as from parents or relatives found, after investigation, to be unable to provide suitable homes for them.

It is in harmony with the original purposes and objects of the Children's Aid Society that an increasing number of Poor Boards throughout the State look to the Society to provide suitable homes for the children coming into their care. A great work which the pioneers of the Society performed for the dependent and neglected children of the State of Pennsylvania was to secure the enactment of a law preventing the keeping of normal children over two years of age in any almshouse longer than sixty days. Following the enactment of this law, the Society became the placing-out agent of a considerable number of Poor Boards. The Children's Aid Societies in Eastern and Western Pennsylvania now have in their care more children received from the Poor Board and Almshouse authorities of various Counties in the State than at any time in their history.

In my report last year to the Association I pointed out that the Society which I have the honor to represent, although the oldest in Pennsylvania, is not the only one in the State bearing the same name. You are already familiar with the fact that for convenience in administration and for other reasons, the Children's Aid Society of Western Pennsylvania was incorporated in 1889 and includes over twenty counties in the western part of the State. In addition to this, in some other parts of the State, there are independent County Children's Aid Societies doing excellent work.

Last June the Lycoming County Children's Aid Society was organized as a branch of the Philadelphia office. The headquarters of this new district work has been established at Williamsport and a district agent has been secured who will devote his entire time to the work. Through the help of a generous citizen, a temporary receiving home has been opened at Williamsport, where from ten to fifteen children can be kept temporarily until they can be transferred to family homes. This Society will follow in many respects the excellent plan of the Warren County Children's Aid Society.

The Twenty-fifth Anniversary of the Franklin County Children's Aid Society will be celebrated next week by a series of public meetings at Greencastle, Waynesboro, Chambersburg and Mercersburg. The Society is in a flourishing condition and is to be congratulated upon the completion of twenty-five years of most useful work.

The Franklin County Children's Aid Society is at present engaged in raising funds to increase its endowment to $30,000, so that the income therefrom may be used to enlarge and widen its work and provide for the supervision of children placed in family homes. When this fund is completed it will be a splendid illustration of the effective working together of a private charity and the public Poor Officials in the interest of dependent children.

It is probable that during the coming year Children's Aid Societies will be organized in a number of counties adjoining Franklin. Our County Auxiliaries in Eastern Pennsylvania are taking renewed interest and can be counted as most active and useful allies in the work of the Children's Aid Society in Eastern Pennsylvania. I hope to be able to present to the Association next year a complete report of the work of each of the counties in the eastern half of the State.

We appreciate the increasing co-operation and support of the Directors of the Poor in our efforts to provide family life for dependent children who have been so unfortunate as to become public charges.

THE WHITE HOUSE CONFERENCE ON THE CARE OF DEPENDENT CHILDREN.

Edwin D. Solenberger, No. 1506 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

On December 25, 1908, President Roosevelt called a Conference on the Care of Dependent Children to meet at Washington January 25 and 26, 1909. The President invited about 200 men and women, representing every State in the Union, every form of child-helping work and every phase of religious belief. In his letter of invitation to the Conference the President said:

"Surely nothing ought to interest our people more than the care of children who are destitute and neglected, but not delinquent. Personally, I very earnestly believe that the best way in which to care for dependent children is in the family home. In Massachusetts many orphan asylums have been discontinued and thousands of children who have formerly gone to the orphan asylums are now kept in private homes, either on board with payment from public or private treasuries, or adopted homes provided by the generosity of foster parents."

In opening the Conference at the White House on the afternoon of January 25, 1909, President Roosevelt said:

"There can be no more important subject from the standpoint of the nation than that of the child; because, when you take care of the children you are taking care of the nation of tomorrow; and it is incumbent upon everyone of us to do all in his or her power to provide for the interests of those children whom cruel misfortune has handicapped at the very outset of their lives. I earnestly hope that the members of this Conference will take a progressive stand, so as to establish a goal toward which the whole country can work. In other words, I earnestly hope that each of you will consider not only the interests of his immediate locality, but the interests of the nation as a whole. There are, of course, several different types of conditions which you are trying to meet. I believe that we all of us have come to the conclusion that, where possible, the thing to be done for the child is to provide a home for it; and that where that is not possible we should make the conditions as nearly as possible like those which the child would have in a home. There is ample room for all existing institutions, but the work of extension should, so far as possible, be a work of extension in home-placing."

Following the introductory address by the President, the Conference held five sessions during which fourteen separate propositions were discussed affirmatively and negatively by speakers identified with practically all forms of child-helping forms of work in the United States. The conclusions of the Conference were drawn up by a Committee on Resolutions which had represented in its membership Catholics, Jews and Protestants; Juvenile Courts, Children's Societies and Orphan Asylums. The resolutions presented by this Committee were unanimously adopted by the Conference. The following is a condensed statement of the Confernce Resolutions:

1. Home Care:—Home life is the highest and finest product of civilization. It is the great moulding force of mind and of character. Children should not be deprived of it except for urgent and compelling reasons. Children of parents of worthy character, suffering from temporary misfortune, and children of reasonably efficient and deserving mothers, who are without the support of the normal breadwinner, should, as a rule, be kept with their parents, such aid being given as may be necessary to maintain suitable homes for the rearing of the children. This aid should be given by such methods and from such sources as may be determined by the general relief policy of each community, preferably in the form of private charity, rather than of public relief. Except in unusual circumstances the home should not be broken up for reasons of poverty, but only for considerations of inefficiency or immorality.

2. Preventive Work:—Effective measures should be adopted to prevent blindness, disease and accidents which cause dependency.

3. Home Finding:—As to the children who for sufficient reasons must be removed from their own homes, or who have no homes, it is desirable that, if normal in mind and body, and not requiring special training, they should be cared for in families whenever practicable. The carefully selected foster home is for the normal child the best substitute for the natural home. Such homes should be selected by a most careful process of investigation, carried on by skilled agents, through personal investigation, and with due regard to the religious faith of the child. After children are placed in homes, adequate visitation, with careful consideration of the physical, mental, moral and spiritual training and development of each child, on the part of the responsible home-finding agency, is essential.

It is recognized that for many children foster homes without payment for board are not practicable immediately after the children become dependent, and that for children requiring temporary care only, the free home is not available. For the temporary, or more or less permanent, care of such children different methods are in use, notably the plan of placing them in families; paying for their board: and the plan of institutional care. Contact with family life is preferable for these children, as well as for other normal children. It is necessary, however, that a large number of carefully selected boarding homes be found, if these children are to be cared for in families. The extent to which such families can be found should be ascertained by careful inquiry and experiment in each locality. Unless and until such homes are found, the use of institutions is necessary.

4. Cottage System:—So far as it may be found necessary to temporarily or permanently care for certain classes of children in institutions, these institutions should be conducted on the cottage plan as far as possible.

5. Incorporation:—To engage in the work of caring for needy children is to assume a most serious responsibility and should, therefore, be permitted only to those who are definitely organized for the purpose, who are of suitable character, and possess, or have reasonable assurance of securing, the funds needed for their support. The only practicable plan of securing this end is to require the approval by a State Board of Charities or other body exercising similar powers, of the incorporation of all child-caring agencies, including the approval of any amendments of the charter of a benevolent corporation, if it is to include child-caring work; and by forbidding other than duly incorporated agencies to engage in the care of needy children.

6. State Inspection:—The proper training of destitute children being essential to the well-being of the State it is a sound policy that the State, through some duly authorized representative should inspect the work of all agencies which care for dependent children.

7. Inspection of Educational Work:—Educational work of institutions and agencies caring for dependent children should be supervised by State educational authorities.

8. Facts and Records:—Complete histories of dependent children and their parents should be confidentially recorded for guidance of child-caring agencies. Every child-caring agency should—

(a) Secure full information concerning the character and circumstances of the parents and near relatives of each child in whose behalf application is made, through personal investigation by its own representative, unless adequate information is supplied by some other reliable agency.

(b) Inform itself by personal investigation at least once a year of the circumstances of the parents of children in its charge, unless the parents have been legally deprived of guardianship, and unless this information is supplied by some other responsible agency.

(c) Exercise supervision over children under their care until such children are legally adopted, are returned to their parents, attain their majority or are clearly beyond the need of further supervision.

(d) Make a permanent record of all information thus secured.

9. Physical Care:—Every needy child should receive the best medical and surgical attention, and be instructed in health and hygiene.

10. Co-operation:—Local child caring agencies should co-operate and establish joint bureaus of information.

11. Undesirable Legislation:—Prohibitive Legislation against transfer of dependent children between States should be repealed.

12. Permanent Organization:—A permanent organization for work along the lines of these resolutions is desirable.

13. Federal Children's Bureau:—Establishment of a Federal Children's Bureau is desirable, and enactment of pending bill is earnestly recommended.

14. Suggest special message to Congress favoring Federal Children's Bureau and other legislation applying above principles to District of Columbia and other Federal territory.

President Roosevelt in his closing address to the Conference on Tuesday evening, January 26th, in commenting on the conclusions adopted by the Conference, said:

"I very earnestly hope that the managers and directors of all institutions and societies throughout the United States will carefully study the recommendations of this body of experts. I hope that this study will be given alike by the men in public and the men in private life, that legislators, public officials, philanthropists, will try to apply these principles in their philanthropic work for children. I hope that they will apply not only what is good, but what is wise, in what you have recommended."

A limited number of the printed reports of the White House Conference on the Care of Dependent Children has been allotted for free distribution. Copies may be secured by applying to Edwin D. Solenberger, 1506 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

Mrs. S. E. Vantine:—I want to say that McKean County has a temporary Home of its own for its own children. The property is owned by the County and held in trust by Mayor Hoffman and Mr. R. B. Stone. I want to say, as President of the Children's Aid Society since its inception, that we are working in the utmost harmony and sympathy of the Commissioners of this County. They have always helped us in every way. We are very proud of our Home. It is conducted on the cottage plan and I think it was THE Home that Judge Bouton had in mind when he said that he asked for real Homes for poor and dependent children. We encourage every mother we can to keep her child. She may not be able to keep it in her own home but we encourage her to join with us in keeping it in this temporary Home, where she can visit it and help to pay its board. If it is a Poor Commissioners' child she can assist them, in paying its board, and still feel that the child is hers. That is part of the pdeasure of our working, the satisfaction of receiving from some mother who for the time could not take care of her young child but can put it in this Home for a month or two and go out to work and get into position where she can take the child with her. It isn't taken from her because of a few weeks destitution.

We invite you all to visit this Home; and the ladies are invited to the Women's Literary Club of Bradford this afternoon.

Upon motion the Convention here adjourned until 1:30 P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention was called to order at 1:30 p. m. by President Boyne.

President Boyne read an invitation from the Directors of the Young Men's Christian Association of Bradford, for the delegates to visit their rooms.

President Boyne:—I understand that some of you misunderstood the invitation to the reception at Mrs. Dresser's. I am sorry if some of you didn't get there. Tomorrow we would like to take you to Rock City. It is an interesting place and made me feel, when I first saw them, as we used to sing, "Could we but climb where Moses stood, and view the landscape o'er."

The Convention was here entertained by the Girl's Chorus of the Bradford High School, whose singing was received with applause, and an encore was demanded, to which they responded with the catchy song, "Sweet Miss Mary."

Mrs. Jane B. Ball of Warren here read the following interesting Paper, "The Mother's Relation to the School," which yas received with applause.

THE MOTHER'S RELATION TO THE SCHOOL.

The mother's relation to the school is becoming an important subject in connection with the topics of the child of today. That there is a barrier between the home and the school is evident, and how to bring a closer relationship between teacher, mother and child is the question before us.

The teacher will say the fault lies with the mother and the mother vice-versa.

Have you ever watched a crowd of children, after the school has been dismissed and listened to their conversation? Living near one of our schools I have had opportunity to watch and have heard things which gave much food for thought. The troubles in school looked at from a child's point of view assume vast proportions. He is misunderstood, the teacher is incompetent, "My mother says this, or that or the other thing" or "Why do we have to do this?" As one teacher said to me: "Looked at through the child's eyes he is probably right." His little mind cannot solve these matters and here is one place where he requires assistance from the home.

One writer has said: "Childhood has its own way of seeing, thinking and feeling, and nothing is more foolish than to try to substitute our own for them. I would as soon require a child to be five feet as to have judgment at ten."

In the ideal home the parent is intelligent enough to understand what is best for the child, discussions take place, the child is permited his view and he is thus continually learning. The child should take the same interest in the school as in the home and by discussions of school topics in the home, would it antagonize the influence that the teacher has over the child? To avoid this one way would be for mothers and teachers to co-operate so as to be of mutual benefit to both. One plan would be to have what you might call a "Mother Society."

The principal of one of our schools said to me: "Oh, if we could only become acquainted with all the mothers." Of course that is impossible. But a good plan would be to have the Mother's Club meet once a month, with the teachers, open to all of the mothers. Have the meeting conducted by one of the mothers, the teachers taking second place, ready to answer questions and take part in discussions started by the mothers. How much better it is to discuss the subject of night work, monitors, etc., with the teacher herself than among ourselves, for then we get both sides of the question. Not only does it benefit the mother but the teacher also, for the mother is very often able to demonstrate the practical side while the teacher's is only theoretical, and again the teacher is able to study the mother herself, which alone is a great help.

A teacher said to me the other day: "Do you know Mrs. So and So?" I said, "slightly." She said: "I do wish I knew her," and she went on to explain that the son is in her room and that some things must be brought to the mother's notice. "But," the teacher explained, "I know I can accomplish a lot with that boy if his mother will help me in the right way, but I am so afraid to say anything for fear my influence will be spoiled." I asked her what her impression was and she said, judging from observation of the boy and things he has said, that his mother considers him in the way, does not interest herself at all what he does. Now this teacher knows that by going at this boy in a kind, conservative way much good can be accomplished.

Luther Burbank says: "That the most sensitive material in all the world upon which to work is the nature of a little child, given ideal conditions under which to work upon this nature, and the end desired will as certainly come as it comes in the cultivation of the plant."

Now here to my mind is where the Mother's Club or Society would do good. The mother or guardian would awaken to the fact that her responsibility does not cease the day she takes her child to school for the first time.

When you stop to consider that the acquaintance of teacher and child does not commence until the child has attained the age of 6, 7 and 8 years, and the different natures to contend with, the conscientious teacher can be excused for criticising the indifference of the parent. "American parents have been criticized for taking too much for granted, that because the State instructs their children in arithmetic, geography and other things, it must teach them all the Christian and social graces besides."

I have heard several mothers at different times discuss the question of keeping children after school. The majority thought that after a child had been in school all day, that it was unjust to keep him longer. Also the question of a visiting physician and nurse. Much could be done towards answering these questions by the mothers themselves. How many mothers know that perhaps in the same room with her happy, well-cared for child there is probably one who has not had a taste of food, and too sensitive to say so. Let there be a little fund started by those who can afford it, for just such emergencies. Let there also be lectures or talks and sometimes for the children, on public health, amusements, civics, etc.

To the child the parents stand for all that is good and wonderful. They are appealed to in nearly every case, even for decision in his troubles with other boys, they know most everything. Next to the parent comes the teacher, whose wisdom in answering questions is wonderful. Weren't you in the seventh heaven of delight when your teacher noticed you especially or deigned to come and call on your parents? Can't you see how his ideals would be shattered at any clashing between the two?

There is another point to be considered. If the child comes home with a poor report card so many are punished without an investigation having been made. Or if a complaint is sent to the home either the child is severely punished or the teacher comes in for a severe criticism. It is far better to take the little one in your arms, let him know you are in sympathy with him, learn the truth from his own lips, than to make a coward of him, inducing him to tell lies to escape punishment. They have been known to sign their own report cards when not up to the standard expected at home for fear of punishment. By a litle reasonable investigation the seat of the trouble is soon rectified. On the other hand, I believe in commending a child for any good reports you hear about him, in school or out. It is human nature to want to hear good about ourselves. Let him know you are pleased, join in being happy with him, it will bring the good out in him. He will go on trying to please you. So many children are led to believe that they are incapable of being good. I have in mind a boy whom the teachers consider incorrigible, but I say not. His home life and environment have been such that nothing has been expected of him, no thought given about his associates, where he goes or the like. I feel certain that if that boy were made to feel he could be of some use, that he is capable and could make his teacher happy, if he is handled in the right way, I feel certain that boy will come out all right and I hope soon to have an opportunity to try.

Might I make a few suggestions? Criticism has been heard of mothers visiting the school at any time convenient to them, but which would interfere with the teacher's work. Why not have certain days for visiting, when the teacher could plan the work so that she could devote some time to the mother.

Another suggestion would be for the different "Women's Clubs" in the city to devote some of their time to this subject. Let them appoint committees to visit the different schools, become acquainted with the teachers and arrange meetings between the mothers of the neighborhood and the teachers. Let these clubs devote several meetings a year to the discussion of school subjects and invite the teachers to participate.

In towns where there are no Women's Clubs to do this work a School League or an Auxiliary to School Directors could be formed to co-operate with the teachers and Directors to bring mothers and teachers into friendly and social intercourse where these subjects could be discussed.

In closing let me quote:

"The first principle of education is train yourself and the first rule to follow if you wish to possess yourself of a child's will is master your own."

MRS. LEON G. BALL,
Warren, Pa., October, 1909.

Following the reading of Mrs. Ball's Paper Mrs. Ada Cable, Director of the Children's Home at Bradford, and Editor of the Bradford Sunday Herald, addressed the Convention

"WOMAN'S PROBLEM."

"Just take enough of good Scotch snuff,
Says the parson to his hearer,
You'll keep awake,
And grace partake
And to the truth come nearer.

Go now, forthwith, my dear good parson Herman,
And take enough
Of that same snuff,
And put it in your sermon."

There are a great many Rip Van Winkles to whom this world is a sleepy hollow. They are asleep, ears closed, they hear not the cry of the children; eyes shut, they see not the old men and old women, who have nothing, not even the little drop of oil to keep their glittering flame of life aglow. They know not the unfortunate, who have lived to see the passing of all things. One of the problems of the women of today is to rouse all Rip Van Winkles from their slumber. We propose to put enough snuff of the Scotch variety in our sermons to cause them to sit up and take notice. We are up to snuff. No strategy or persuasion will make us lose sight of our purpose. We will not be snuffed out so long as the problem of helpless children confronts us.

The brightest ray of light on the present is the effort put forth to care for the fallen leaves, blown about by the winds of adversity. So we have homes for the aged and infirm.

The star of hope for the future lies in preventive methods. Proper child culture, the care of young minds and bodies, is the ounce of prevention that will prove untold pounds of cure for the future of humanity. So we have Children's Aid Societies, Children's Homes and Mother's Clubs. The ancient idea of Children's Aids and Mother's Clubs was a hickory one wielded with vigor on the person of the child. Its constitution or fundamental principle was contained in the phrase, "Spare the rod and spoil the child." It is a long journey from the dark ages to the brilliant light of the present, and all along the way we have been gaining knowledge from contact with the rocks of experience, and gathering blossoms of sentiment from the hedges and byways, which has inclined us to kindlier methods. We have reversed the old order. We spare the child.

The women of Pennsylvania have been confronted with the problem of safe-guarding the welfare of the children who toil. The great Keystone State has been singularly lax along this line of preventive work. And this, too, in the State whose chief city is known as the City of Brotherly Love. The State where the Battle of Brandywine was fought and where thousands died that awful winter at Valley Forge for freedom. Where the battle of Gettysburg was won that liberated a million slaves. Why should we keep our own children in industrial slavery? When Divinity was on earth he reached out loving arms to little children and said: "Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven." Who are we, that we should confine them to the dark places of the earth?

The women of this State, confronted with the problem of child labor, aroused public sentiment and the law makers from their torper, although it was necessary in some instances, where the sleepers had been drugged by factory owners to administer so much snuff that they sneezed their official heads off before better laws were secured.

This problem has not yet been properly solved. But there is a good crop of snuff and the women are wide awake. There is hope for the future.

The problems of women, what are they in these days of opportunity? There was a time when problems confronted us on every side. Maud Muller is not an idle tale, it is a picture from real live. As she stands in the sweet-scented clover fields, looking up the road (the Judge has gone) her face lit up with dreams of happiness. What a pity to spoil so pretty a picture with my unromantic snuff box. Why not let life go a-maying with love and hope and poesy for a little while? Maud Muller will waken soon enough from happy dreams to sad realities. Soon enough will her long-lashed hazel eyes be dimmed with tears, her rosy cheek whitened with poverty and care. Too soon her sweet voice join in the cry that rises from the dark places of the earth, that comes in agonized shrieks from the lost spirits in hades, that sad, sad wail, "It might have been."

I trust no one will infer from that remark about hades that I have been there. That was a flight of imagination. To be sure it is a rather disagreeable place to fly to, but I am not strong enough to pioneer for myself. I follow the great leaders, Milton and Dante. Maud Muller dreaming yet, dreaming in her humble cottage of the broad halls of the noble judge, with wrinkled brow and gray hair, still dreaming. That was a problem of environment only so far back as Whitier's day. But the modern woman is alert to her opportunities. The modern Maud Muller would let the hay go to grass. She might study stenography, get a job in one of the Judge's competitor's offices and help elect his rival Judge, or she may choose to go on the stage, marry the Judge's father and own the broad halls for herself.

Time was when the sentimental, gentle maid gazed at the heavens and said something like this: "Twinkle, twinkle litle star, How I wonder what you are. Up above the world so high, Like a diamond in the sky."

Now that problem isn't a guess for the maid of today. She studies astronomy, knows all about the principles of refraction and parallax, follows the course of the stars through the kleroscope. She knows what the stars are made of, what they are doing and where they are going.

You are all familiar with the ancient witch doctor, an old crone, with ragged gown and unkempt hair, concocting herbs in an old kettle. Contrast that picture with the present college girl graduate, in her pleasant office, with her medical diploma, hair arranged neatly, well groomed, no problem for that doctor woman.

These old time problems have been mixed in the crucible of time and eliminated. No woman today lacks opportunity. If she has something to say and says it well she is accorded a respectful hearing. If she can write, her writings are read and paid for. If she can paint a picture, she receives fame and fortune. If her heart yearns over the unhappiness of others, she can minister to their welfare.

It is a fact that despite the large opportunity for winning the world's prizes outside the home the majority of women select the work that keeps them within its walls. They raise their sons to be good citizens and their daughters to be pure women. This is their problem and they solve it correctly.

Others are restless and dissatisfied, seeking they know not what. Spending their days in a vain quest for happiness. Surely they need an awakening, for happiness comes from within.

Many of us have wept over the sorrows of Oliver Twist at the word picture of the little, helpless, emaciated lad, a pathetic figure going with his empty plate asking for more, and the cruel result of his efforts.

Then we go to sleep, without any effort to minister to these pitiable figures in real life.

Truly there is great need for a large crop of snuff and women who are willing to work out these problems. For the kay to the solution of these problems is work. Work looks unlovely, but clasped to the heart, will prove a fair underline with a living soul that shall be a helpmeet to thee. We owe it to the world to make it a little better place to live in. The true scope of life lies in ideal regions of life, far beyond our present attainments, and woman's vocation is to live within the vision of this ideal. We women must weave the pattern given to us in the Mount of Transfiguration of our highest moment to make our life vision real. And who can doubt that social ills would be remedied. We should hear less of lives wasted by luxury and lives wasted by poverty.

I trace a resemblance in my life to the lives of great people. Christopher Columbus discovered America. Dr. Cook discovered the North Pole. He also discovered what a skeptical cuss Peary is. I have made a discovery. I have opened my snuff box for another pinch of snuff and have discovered it is empty.

The Address of Mrs. Cable was received with applause.

President Boyne:—That is the Bradford Sunday Herald for you. Don't forget to subscribe.

"HOW TO SUCCESSFULLY MANAGE AN ALMS-HOUSE."

Address Delivered by R. W. Robinson.

The management of an Alms-house, as many may think, is a position not difficult to fill; neither is it regarded by the masses as being one of much responsibility. To those of us who have been engaged in the work, we view it from a different standpoint. Although the people who supply the means to keep in motion the mechanism that controls our Public Institutions, rarely pause to consider as to whether or not the hand that holds the lever is guided by that knowledge so essential in the discharge of duty. This indifference in this respect too often places in power men wholly incompetent. When one is confronted by a great duty he should ask himself the question, "Am I fitted to do the work? Have I the knowledge, the energy, and the courage necessary to supply the demand?" No engineer would design a bridge with a capacity of ten tons, if at times a greater weight were to be borne. So it is in public life, first the duties of position should be considered, then the man to discharge them.

In the management of an Alms-house there are many and varied duties constantly confronting you. To discharge them properly a man needs to be naturally gifted. He may be a good business man; he may be kind hearted, liberal-minded, generous in many ways, and yet be a failure. Then you may naturally ask, what should the qualifications be, to successfully fill such position. I dwell upon this point, knowing it to be one of vital importance. Almost anyone could climb into the cab of a locomtive, pull the throttle and start the huge machine in motion, without knowing anything about its mechanical construction. How many are there who would care to take passage on the railroad train controlled by the hand of an unskilled man.

In public affairs it too frequently happens that men are placed in public positions, lacking the necessary qualifications to successfully fill them. Then the cry is echoed from hill-top to valley below—telling of failure, of misplaced hopes, of the betrayal of confidence—condemnation on every hand, not stopping to ask ourselves the question, to whom belongs the blame. If we hesitate for a minute and ask ourselves the question, have we acted wisely, we are apt to meet with a negative reply. Then when a man aspires to a position of responsibility, those who hold within their power the gift should ask the question, does he possess the necessary qualifications. It it chance to be the position as manager of an Alms-house, then he needs to be a business man, a farmer, a mechanic, a financier and a disciplinarian, and with these united qualifications he cannot expect to fully succeed without the assistance of a matron who thoroughly understands the management of a home. Those of you who have had the experience will frankly admit this point.

Having considered the question of qualification as relates to management of an Alms-house, we now pass to the proper care of the worthy poor. Not all counties are well equipped with modern buildings as is the case with Blair County. Our insane Asylum and Alms-house are located one mile from the county seat and on a farm of 280 acres of fertile soil. The buildings are sufficiently elevated as to afford good drainage, which insures healthy surroundings. They are heated by steam and furnished with electric light. Ample provisions are also to be found for proper ventilation, all of which conduces to the welfare of inmates and employes. With these surroundings we would naturally think that hap-happiness and contentment should reign, but not so. Among their number is to be found the grumbler, the inebriate, contentious, the tattler, the false-hod bearer and the profane all consolidated in one family. To properly govern this homogeneous class of humanity, none of whom are fit to care for themselves, is no small task. Among this number you will find those who will sometimes assume the responsibility of advising the stewart how to proceed, by the way of injecting into the work better methods through which certain conditions might be improved. Only a short time ago I had an inmate suggest to me the possibility of making the Alms-house self-supporting; he finally wound up by asking for a piece of tobacco. Did he get it? no. I promptly advised him that I had about come to the conclusion to act upon his suggestion, and would begin by cutting off the supply of tobacco. This suggests an interesting phase in this discussion vis:—that of making an Alms-house as nearly self-supporting as possible. The two most important essentials in the way of guiding us in this direction lies in the cutting of expenses on the one hand, and the increasing of income on the other. There is no reason why an Almshouse should not be run on a purely business basis; along this line I have been working in a quiet way, paying particular attention to all the little things, as they from time to time arrest my attention, until today we are prepared to show a scale of economy difficult to duplicate in other similar institutions. When I tell you we are boarding our inmates in the Blair County Home at an expense of from 10 1-2 to 11 cents per day, you will no doubt intimate it can't be done, and furnish good, wholesome food, but will say our records are carefully kept and at the close of each day we can tell you just what the food expense bill has been for the day. In the supply of clothing and necessaries the same care is displayed. If time permitted, I would be pleased to tell you just how such stage of economy may be reached. I now pass to the question of how to increase the income, as being the next most important matter, and upon this point I can only touch briefly. Most Almshouses of the present day are vast improvements over former conditions, and they are becoming recognized as superior homes for not only taking care of the poor of our land, but in like manner most suitable places for the care of those who may be able to pay maintenance. Most people would elicit surprise to be informed that the modern Alms-house excels in the treatment of the sick that of many private homes, and if it were generally known the time would not be far distant when many private patients would be cared for in our County Homes, from which a profitable revenue could be derived.

Another source of revenue which can, in most instances, be greatly increased, is that derived from the farm. To make an Alms-house farm highly profitable much care should be displayed in not only maintaining the fertility of the soil, but at the same time increasing it. Time forbids my dwelling on this point, which is one of the most vital mportance, inasmuch as we are always in touch with cheap labor, although at times it requires much skill to not only exact it, but in like manner to properly apply it. It is a rare thing to find in our Alms-house men who know anything about farming. If they do, it is an easy matter for them to secure employment among neighboring farmers. Such conditions largely increase our burdens, and unless the management is something of a genius in his way, he will often find his pathway one not pleasant to tread.

Many things upon which I would desire to dwell must be passed over, knowing that I have already encroached upon the time of the Convention. I thank you for your attention and congratulate you upon the beauty of your city, surrounded as it is by hills on every side, dotted with oil derricks galore—mute messengers of your former wealth and prosperity—and as we turn our face homeward bound we carry with us pleasant recollections of kind treatment. Reaching the crest of the Allegheny mountains with a sense of pride we look down her eastern slopes, where, nestling close at her base is seen th hustling city of Altona, the home of the working man, wherein is located the largest railroad shops in the world, and drifting the gaze outward and beyond the eye is greeted with the green valleys wherein the hand of industry has fashioned many fertile farms and established prosperous homes.

Dr. J. J. Emmens, of Somerset, read the following Paper, which was received with applause: "Duties and Responsibilities of the Directors of the Poor in Contagious Diseases and Epidemics."

DUTIES OR DIRECTORS OF THE POOR IN CONTAGIOUSN DISEASES AND EPIDEMICS.

By Dr. J. J. Emmens, Superintendent Somerset County Hospital for Insane, Somerset, Pa.

The law regarding the duties and responsibilities of Directors of the Poor in contagious diseases or epidemics is definite and explicit since the passage of the Act of May, 28th, 1907. Prior to this time the duties of these officers was not clearly defined. The Act of 1893 enables the council of each borough to establish a local Board of Health, whose duty it is to look after the general health of the community and to establish quarantines in cases of contagious disease or epidemics of the same.

The Act of 1899 empowers the School Directors of each township of the State to exercise the powers of a Board of Health, to make rules and regulations to prevent the spread of contagious or infectious diseases, to appoint and fix the compensation of a sanitary agent, and to require physicians in such localities to report all such cases to them.

These two acts, while fairly complete regarding the care of the public health, failed to direct who should provide for the maintenance of families so quarantined where the source of income was cut off by the establishing of a quarantine.

One interesting case was decided by Judge Lindsay of Warren Co., in 1903. It appears that there occurred in the family of one James Kibby a case of smallpox. The case was reported to the Board of Health and before the quarantine was placed on the home the doctor informed Kibby that if he remained away from home he would not be quarantined and could continue his occupation. Mr. Kibby was the sole support of his family and decided to remain away. He found, however, that because he had been exposed to the disease his fellow workmen would not work with him. He therefore returned to his family to assist with the work at home.

Mr. Kibby and his family were dependent on his labor for support and when he was quarantined and deprived of his income it left him and his family in a destitute condition; and on the 25th day of February, 1903, Dr. Ball made an application before H. S. Perry, Esq., for an order or relief for Mr. Kibby and family, making the usual affidavit. The Directors of the Poor took an appeal from the order issued by the Justice. The evidence shows that at the time Mr. Kibby and his family were quarantined in their home he was employed and able to support himself and his family, and did not need or desire any assistance. After the quarantine was raised he again secured employment and was able to and did support himself and family. Under the facts disclosed was Mr. Kibby a pauper and entitled to relief under the Poor Laws of the State?

Judge Lindsay decided in favor of the Directors of the Poor, claiming that "a person who is ordinarily employed and able to support himself and family, not needing or desiring any assistance, is not a pauper nor entitled to relief under the poor laws of the Commonwealth.

The Act of May 28th, 1907, fixes the responsibilities of maintenance as follows: "Be it enacted, etc., that wherever any head of a family or a person shall be quarantined by any authority, because of any infectious or contagious disease, and by reason of such quarantine such person becomes unable to pay the expense of the maintenance or treatment of himself or his family during the period of quarantine, he shall be considered a 'poor person' or a 'needy and indigent poor' person within the meaning of the Poor Laws of this Commonwealth."

It, therefore, becomes the duty of the Directors of the Poor to care for any family requiring aid, where the source of income to that family is cut off by reason of a quarantine placed upon them for any contagious or infectious disease.

Dr. J. Lewis Shrodes:—I would like to present the report of the Committee on Resolutions. The Committee desires to submit the following:

Dr. Shrodes read the report of the Committe on Resolutions, as follows, which upon motion was adopted:

RESOLUTIONS.

Resolved, That the Constitution of this Association be printed in the Report of the Convention.

Resolved, That the Committee on Legislation be directed to petition the General Assembly at its next session for the passage of a joint resolution, authorizing the appointment of a Commission by the Governor of the Commonwealth to codify the Poor Laws of the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That the thanks of the members of the Association be extended to the Committee of Arrangements and to the Citizens of Bradford for the generous hospitality extended.

Resolved, That the thanks of the Association be extended to the Press of Bradford, for the accurate manner in which the transactions of the Association have been printed.

Resolved, That the thanks of the Association be extended to Mrs. Dresser and the Children's Aid Society assisting her, for the reception extended at her elegant home.

Committee on Resolutions.

Col. E. P. Gould of Erie submitted and read the following Report on "Legislation for Charitable Purposes:"

REPORT ON LEGISLATION.

The Legislature of 1909 was, so far as I can learn, one of the cleanest and most scandal free, of any that has met for many years, yet it was not without faults. One of the most apparent of all its shortcomings was its cowardice, or lack of courgae to face the evils that confronted it. Especially was this the case with reference to appropriations. There was no attempt, so far as the result shows, to make the amounts appropriated t the revenues. Everything that was asked for, was in the end granted, and then the whole matter was turned over to the Governor to pare down and veto to the amounts voted to bring the whole of the appropriations approved by him within the probable revenues.

In compliance with the resolution of our last Convention a bill was prepared for an appropriation of $100,000 per year, to help defray the expenses of our Association. This bill was introduced in both houses of the Legislature—in the Senate by Senator James of Luzerne County, and in the House by Asemblyman Detzel of Erie County. The House bill was finally passed, after being reduced one-half. It was thought by those having the bill in charge that as it was a new appropriation it would meet less opposition and be more likely to succeed if it was reduced in amount. This was done, but owing to the fact that there was not enough revenues in sight to meet the appropriations, the Governor was compelled to veto and disapprove many deserving appropriations. Our little bill for this reason was slaughtered with the rest.

In this connection it is proper to state that the thanks of this Association are especially due to the Hon. Mr. Detzel, who had the bill in charge, for his faithful efforts in getting the bill through the Legislature; and it is but just to say that Senator James and Senator Sisson were watchful of our interests in the Senate.

We cannot refrain from saying, in this connection, that so long as the present system of making appropriations to the local hospitals prevails, there is little use of any organization, however meritorious, not already on the list of those receiving appropriations, to try to secure one. It has become the practice for each hospital to ask for very large sums, without reference to the actual needs or merits of the institution. The members of the Legislature are made to feel that their future political success largely depends upon the amounts they secure from the State for their local institutions. The struggle then ensues, which finally results in a log rolling match in which the members help each other to push their pet appropriations through. This cannot be remedied until the whole system is changed. No local hospital, or one not under State control, should receive a cent unless it previously furnished a true and sworn statement of the amount of free work done by that hospital during the previous year, and then the sums appropriated should be based on that free work, and not on the influence or pull which the friends of the various hospitals may have.

If the Board of Public Charities would take this matter in hand and thoroughly investigate the various hospitals and their manner of doing business, and familiarize themselves with the wants and needs of each institution, and then insist on controlling the various appropriations by giving facts in relation thereto, the present evils would greatly diminish, if not wholly disappear; but now, as one member of the Legislature recently stated: "No legislator pays any attention whatever to any recommendation made by the Board of Public Charities." This would be different if the recommendation was based upon the actual needs of the institution, as it should be.

It is a sad commentary upon our system of oversight and regulation of our charities that there is no place or organization today where one can get the necessary information that is required to take the initial steps to formulate a plan to unify the administration of public charities in the state. Unless there is a decided change in this respect soon there will be a irresistable public demand for a State Department that will have control of such matters, and that Department will be compelled to know all about the charities that receive State aid, and how they are conducted, and to furnish all necessary information about them.

There was very little, if any, legislation enacted by the last Legislature that was harmful, so far as relates to the various charities of the State.

The Acts that were passed which directly relate to the Directors of the Poor, are as follows:

Act No. 67, page 113, of the Session Laws of 1909, provides that the accounts of incorporated poor districts shall be audited by audditors elected in the district, and not by the County or township auditors.

No. 113, page 159, repeals that section of the local act of Chester County, that fixes the fees or regulates the pay of the Directors of the Poor in that County. By the repeal of this section the Directors will be paid as provided in the general Act of 1907.

No. 151, page 241, amends the Act of 1876, providing for the erection of Poor Houses and the support of the poor, as amended by the Act of 1901 which authorizes the directors to make alterations and improvements of buildings, by extending the period of redeeming and cancelling the bonds issued therefor from 5 to 20 years.

No. 184, page 287, amends previous asts by changing the number of Directors in certain counties from 5 to 3, and lengthening the terms of service from 2 to 3 years, and provides for the election of a non-partisan board. Just what counties this act affects I am unable to state.

No. 212, page 382, amends the act fixing the salaries of Directors of the Poor in counties having over 150,000 population, and authorizes the Directors to employ counsel. The counties having over 150,000 population are Allegheny, Berks, Lackawanna, Lancaster, Luzerne, Philadelphia, Schuylkill and Westmoreland—8 in all.

No. 284, page 506, regulates the salaries of County Commissioners and their employes in counties where the County Commissioners are ex officio Directors of the Poor; making the salaries in counties of over 50,000 population $1200.00; in counties of over 25,000 and less than 50,000 population $1000.00; and in counties of less than 25,000 population $800.00

No. 294, page 533, provides that poor districts which have supplied or may hereafter supply a hospital for the care and treatment of the indigent insane shall receive the same compensation from the State as is given to the State Hospitals, provided that such hospitals are equipped with all the modern appliances for the treatment of the insane and furnish the same care and attendance as the State Hospitals give. This Act relates only to those districts that provide for the care and treatment of all classes of insane.

No. 296, page 535, amends the Act which provides for the County care of indigent insane, known as the "County Care Act," by requiring the State to pay $2.00 instead of $1.50 per week for every person so kept.

Other bills which were passed which directly or indirectly affect the members of our Association, or some branch of the work they are interested in, are the following:

No. 49, page 63, amends the act for the governing of cities of the second class by changing the Department of Charities and Correction to simply a Department of Charities, and creates a Department of Health, and permits the same person to be placed at the head of both departments.

No. 66, page 113, authorizes reform schools and houses of refuge, to board out inmates unfit for indenture or hiring out, an dcount them as being in the institution, and charge the several counties for their support as long as such persons remain under the guardianship of such institution.

No. 182, page 283, provides for the health and safety of minor children in certain employments, by regulating the ages at which they may be employed, how the ages are to be proven, requiring certificates of ages to be given and by whom, and safeguarding such children against injury, etc.

This Act is the one prepared and supported by the Factory Inspector, and if rigidly enforced will do away with many of the evils heretofore complained of.

No. 73, page 119, authorizes the Juvenile Court to alter and amend its orders as to minors under its charge, and maintain its supervision until such minors are 21 years of age.

No. 195, page 302, requires Allegheny County to establish and maintain schools for the care and education of male children who are under the jurisdiction of the Juvenile Courts.

No. 241, page 434, makes it a misdemeanor for any person to contribute to the delinquency of any minor to whom the Juvenile Court has attached.

No. 292, page 520, safeguards the public health by punishing fraud and deception in the manufacture or sale of food stuffs, and prohibits misbranding, etc. This act is known as "The Pure Food Act."

There were five other Acts passed, each of which protects the public against some one article of impure food or drink. The articles protected by these special bills are eggs, lard, milk, ice cream and liquors.

No. 658, page 855, safeguards human life by providing for the regulation and control of certain communicable diseases, (naming them), and provides penalties for violations of the regulations.

No. 36, page 62, declares that when a girl is committed to a reform school or house of refuge the managers of such institution shall continue to have charge of and control over her during her minority.

No. 168, page 260, provides that surety of the peace and wife desertion cases shall be made returnable to the Court of Quarter Sessions forthwith, and the Court may hear them whenever it is convenient.

And No. 128, page 182, authorizes husbands and wives to testify in proceedings growing out of wife desertion cases.

No. 199, page 307, provides for the recovery of money for the care of non-resident persons sick with contagious or infectious diseases who have residences in some other part of the State, and defines a residence for the purposes of this Act.

No. 286, page 512 amends the act which requires the county commissioners to bury any poor veteran of the Civil War, by changing the amount to be expended in each case from $35.00 to $50.00 and extending the benefit of the act to those of any American war.

No. 34, page 59, makes it a crime for any one having charge of a minor child to take or send such child to any immoral place.

No. 144, page 211, regulates the licensing of persons in Philadelphia who are engaged in boarding for pay minors under three years of age.

No. 197, page 306, makes it a misdemeanor to entice or procure, or attempt, to, any woman or girl in this commonwealth for immoral purposes.

No. 210, page 275, provides for the health and safety of minors in coal mines, collieries and breakers, regulating the ages at which they may be employed, their hours of employment, etc.

E. P. GOULD.

Under the Resolution offered the chair appoints the following persons to represent this Association in the Conference at Harrisburg, December 7th and 8th:

George H Butler, Wilkes-Barre, Pa.; Fred Fuller, Scranton; A. P. Childs, Alden Station; L. C. Colborn, Somerset; E. P. Gould, Erie; Mrs. L. B. Walton, Chester; James McB. Robb, Allegheny.

Mr. L. C. Colborn and Dr. J. Lewis Shrodes were appointed by the chair as a Committee to escort the President-elect to the chair.

Upon escorting Mr. Wilson to the platform Dr. Shrodes said:

Mr. President, I have the honor of introducing the President-elect, Mr. Boyd Wilson, of Williamsport.

President-elect Wilson:—Ladies and gentlemen of the Convention: This is an unexpected part of the program, to me, and I will have to beg your indulgence and your help and assistance in my effort to administer the duties of this office to which you have called me. I shall endeavor to do the best I can to make our next Meeting a success, and I can say, on behalf of our people at Williamsport, that I know they will heartily endorse this movement, and I bespeak for you a good time there. We do a considerable boosting there—or the Board of Trade does—and it will be for you people to determine whether or not we can deliver the goods.

In regard to our retiring President, it seems a pity when we have so good a thing that we cannot keep him. A little spice in life helps a great deal, and we have had some very fine doses from our worthy President, and we have enjoyed it very much; and if he comes to Williamsport I think that would be another good joke.

President Boyne:—On me or Williamsport?

Mr. Wilson:—I thank you for this honor. It is an honor to any man to preside over a Convention like this, not only as to its personnel, but also its object. I hope when we meet again we will become better acquainted.

Col. E. P. Gould moves that the President-elect be authorized to appoint the standing Committees that are not provided for, for the coming year, and have them printed in the Report.

Col. Gould:—I think many of you are not aware of the labor of making up this program. Mr. Colborn has been for years the working force of that Department. Now all take hold and assist. If therfe is any subject you want discussed and brought to the attention of the Association send word to the Program Committee and ask that someone be assigned to treat that subject.

I also move that, if there is not an opportunity for Miss Emma W. Spear, of Warren, to read her Paper, that it be printed in the Report.

The motions of Col. Gould are agreed to.

President Boyne:—I will appoint, as toastmaster for the evening, Dr. J. Lewis Shrodes.

Col. Gould:—One of the old and reliable members of this Association died during the past year, Mr. Strine, of Lancaster. I would suggest that the delegates from Lancaster be requested to prepare an obituary and send it to Mr. Colborn, to have inserted in the Minutes, and if they haxe a good photograph of him to have it also in the Report.

The motion is agreed to.

Mr. Colborn:—I am on the program for a Report on the National Conference. I will ask leave to insert that in the proceedings.

Upon motion of Col. Gould, leave is granted to have it inserted in the Report.

A Voice:—As to the form of the Report we are asked to give to the Secretary, I carefully analyzed several of them last year and I think the Form isn't clear. There are no two Reports that seem to be on the same basis all the way through. I think it would be well to have the Form gone over so they can be understood. Statistics are of no value unless they are on the same basis all the way through.

Mr. Colborn: The form the Dr. has analyzed was gotten out by myself and I have tried to get another form, and this is the first time I have heard anything in regard to it. I would like very much if any brother would send me his ideas of a Form, or anyone belonging to the Association if they would write me in regard to it. Perhaps we can arrive at something that will suit all.

Mr. Smith (Erie): If there is anything in the Reports that isn't right we should know it. Our Secretaries and clerks make them out and we want them to be correct and look well. I would further say, as to my experience as President of the Board, we are all interested in the old soldiers, and we are confronted with that matter very often; some old soldier somewhere in the State concludes he will get into the Soldiers'

Home at Erie, and they start him there with barely enough money to get there. When he gets to the home they see his papers are not right and they can't take him. Sometimes the papers must go to Harrisburg. Now what is going to be done with that man? They won't give him a meal of victuals in the Soldiers' Home, and he is sent to the Directors of the Poor. We have to send him to a hotel or to the Home. I think he should be allowed to stay at the Soldiers' Home during that interval.

President Boyne: Isn't that more the fault of the Superintendent of the Soldiers' Home?

Mr. Smith: They claim they are acting under the Rules.

Col. Gould: The law of the Soldiers' Home requires an applicant to make application and comply with certain things before he can be admitted. Every Grand Army Post has been notified of the requirements. If there is anyone who is eligible to the Soldiers' Home you send to the Commission, or anyone of them, and they will send the blanks to make application. When those blanks are made out and he swears to them and sends them to the Board the Board acts upon them and sends him transportation to the Home, and an Order to enter. But sometimes when a man becomes a nuisance in the neighborhood they don't send for an application to send him to the Home, but they raise a little money and send him to Erie, without any proof that he was an old soldier, except, perhaps, that he has an honorable discharge, and he comes into Erie in that way and consequently is thrown upon the Poor Board.

Upon motion the Convention here adjourned until 7:30 this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention was called to order at 7:30 P. M. by President Boyne.

Mrs. Emma W. Speer, Principal Probation Officer of the Juvenile Court of Washington County read the following interesting Paper, which was received with applause:

"RESPONSIBILITY OF PARENTS FOR DELINQUENT CHILDREN."

Perhaps no class of workers for the betterment of children have as great an opportunity to observe the irresponsibility of parents of the present day than Probation Officers. I think the Probation Officers present will agree with me in saying that the result of investigations in the cases of a large number of delinquent children show a lack of parental care as the cause. What Probation Officer does not recall the pitiful little family of children deserted by parents, who should be responsible for their mental, moral and physical well being.

At this moment I have in mind a girl of fifteen, who came to my office one morning, with a fretting baby in her arms, and told me the familiar story, that her father and mother were separated. At that time she did not know where either of them were. The children, (five in number) had been sent to relatives near Wheeling, but the baby was sick and cross, and the aunt turned the girl out with the baby in her arms. She walked the streets of Wheeling until a policeman took her to a doctor, who told her that the baby was so ill that he might die in her arms. The policeman then put her on the train, and paid her fare to Washington, where she knew a family that might help her. The same trouble met the child there; no one wanted the cross baby, so they sent her to the Juvenile Court, and we sent the baby to the hospital, and found the girl a home. The mother was traced and made to return and take charge of these children. A few weeks later three others of this same family were brought to our Detention Room. The mother had gone away and left no trace and the father was in parts unknown. So nothing remained for them but the Children's Home. During the winter two of the three younger children, a boy and a girl, were placed in a fine home together. The other boy was fast going blind, and no one wanted him. He has been cared for in the Home, and is this year to enter as a pupil the Western Pennsylvania School for the Blind. In four years the father did nothing for his children, until a few months ago, when we found him living in a farm, married to a new wife, and we made him take the boys for the summer. It pleases me to think that we perhaps saved these children from delinquency. But unfortunately, we seldom get children until they are delinquent, and then it means a sort of locking the door after the horse is stolen process, which may or may not be successful.

What is more sad than a child from whom purity and innocence has been stolen.

Granted, then, that parents should be responsible for the development of their children in the right way, but are too often directly responsible for their delinquency. What are the probable causes of this state of society? I would say first: the present day home, the domestic and religious life, and the physical care of the children are neglected, because the father and mother, and all to frequently, the children are forced to be wage earners. The mother leaving so early in the morning and being gone until late at night knowing nothing of what the children are doing in her absence, cannot, of course, fulfill her duty to her family. A colored woman said to me one day: "My girls don't know how to do nothing, because I am never home to teach them." This woman was a good, old-time worker, but her children, left to themselves after school hours, ran the streets and went to shows, and her girls were absolutely worthless. In cases like this where the mother must work, she is not altogether to blame, but rather modern conditions and the trend of things which make many such homes a common thing. In the present day home the children scarcely know the father, he having little time to become acquainted with them, or interest himself in their school life or leisure hours, owing to the fact that half of his time he is sleeping during the day and working at night, and the other half the reverse, thus giving him little opportunity to enjoy the pleasures of a real home.

The religious life is neglected, or is very often entirely forgotten, in the great effort to keep soul and body together. The Sabbath is fast growing to be a holiday instead of a holy day. A day of strenuous pleasure seeking, in place of church going and family intercourse. When we eliminate from the family the religious life, with it goes a large part of the affection and interest, which should be a part of the foundation of the family life. In its place creeps in selfishness and indifference to the rights of others and the unity of the family is destroyed. Not long ago a very striking instance of this very lack in a family came to our notice. To my surprise I found in our Detention Rooms the son of a man of a well known family. I almost thought it must be a mistake that he should be there, but upon looking into the matter I found he was charged with a serious offense, and that it was not the first offense. I also found that it was the result of the child's spending his evenings away from home, in the streets, any where he choose. Upon visiting the home I found a very neat, tasteful, well kept and all-together comfortable home. The mother stayed at home with her little family, faithfully worked to keep them clean, neat and well fed, but when I asked the boy why he did not stay in this pretty home evenings and Saturdays he indignantly exclaimed: "Because there is no place to play." The home was in an apartment, and it was true, that it was considered too neat, too clean and too fine for the use of the children, and the boy, having no back yard was forced into the street. When I took the little boy back after an absence of two weeks, during all of which time the mother had not seen him, she looked at him and said: "Well, are you back?" After this the father confided to me that she had no interest whatever in anything religious, and he told me with tears in his eyes that he had been brought up by a Christian mother, and he had taught his little children to say their prayers, but as the mother took no interest in them they soon grew careless and forgot to do it. I had asked this boy to be particular about his prayers at night, and his father told me that he had been, and had also gotten all the rest of the children back to saying theirs. The father finished by saying: "However, it won't last, because their mother won't encourage them."

This made me think of what I recently heard Dr. Borrell of New York say: "The reason so many boys and girls go wrong is because there are not enough praying mothers now." It is plain to be seen that this is a home for grown-ups and not for children, the the sad lack of affection, interest and consideration had driven this little fellow into the street. Very little effort was made, in fact no effort, to have this boy find his amusement in his home. It was not a

Boy's home, kind home;
Taking a boy from off the street,
Where sin and want and squalor meet;
Reaching to him a helping hand—
Lifting him up if need demand;
Kind home, indeed.

We need to consider the conditions surrounding the foreign child separately, as they are peculiar to him. An unjust prejudice has been growing in the minds of the better class Americans against the foreigners, who are crowding into our country. Instead of studying these people and trying to be interested in them, we are apt to set it down in our minds that they are degraded and criminal. A little observation would show us that there are many intelligent, well-meaning people among them, but a great ignorance of American laws and customs. More than 450,000 immigrants have landed at Ellis Island in the last 6 months. What are we to do with the portion of this multitude which is coming to live in our own communities, if it is true, as has been stated, that there are more delinquent children among the foreigners than among our own people, certainly our work is increasing to an alarming degree. My own experience does not lead me to believe that this is true, and I think that the foregin parents feel a greater responsibility about their children and have more affection for them, than many of our own people. The foreign child, or the child of foreign parents, gets away from the parental influence and control in nine cases out of ten because he has a superior education and knowledge of the American world to his parents, his mother in particular, who has little opportunity to learn to speak English, and less to learn American ways. She naturally adheres to her old customs. The child soon begins to consider them inferior to the things he hears and sees all about him, and this applies to the parent's attempts at discipline as well. One little Italian boy said he didn't mind being whipped, but he did hate to be whipped by one of those darned Dagoes, meaning his father.

I was much toushed with the appeal made to me by an Italian woman for her little girl, whom we had in charge, because she seemed to be a misfit in the family. The other six children all picked on her, and even the parents did not seem to understand her. When she was brought to us she was bruised, and her arms showed teeth marks and pinched places. The parents said the children di dthis, and the children confided that the parents had done it. The facts remained, whichever way it was, and the Court refused to allow her to go home. We placed her in a home where she was growing into the hearts of the members of the family very fast. She was a beautiful and a lovable child. After a year the mother came back and wanted her. I did all I could to persuade her to give her up, fearing the child would live the same kind of life when she went back, in spite of the promises they made to take good care of her. Finally the mother cried and said: "I no understand American ways. I no can cook, nor keep my house like you, I don't like to eat your things. My little Mittie she live with American people. She no like to eat the things I cook, she no like the house when she come back, pretty soon she no like her mother. You think it very good, very nice for a child to turn against her mother." So Mittie went back, but I always have an ache in my heart when I think about her.

Are parents responsible for the delinquency of their children, when like an old man I know who had 10 children, they leave their families for months at a time to get on the very best way they can, who after his wife, who was a very good woman, finally died, he ruined his own daughter, and as one of his boys told me, gave them no better home than rabbits. And what of a mother and her two brothers, who educated her boy in crime, taught him the use of burglars' tools, how to cut glass, pick locks, and use false keys, how to get away when he might be caught. Once he even joined the searching party and led them far astray. Let me add this boy was not punished but placed with a good family, and now ambitiously talks of college. I might go on with case after case but a better point is—What shall we do about it? What may be possible remedies for these conditions? Educate the children, and hope that it will make the coming generation better? Yes, this must be done and is being done. But what of the parents and homes? The kindergartens are doing something for the mothers, the schools for adults are helping, and the settlements. Many good influences are at work but let us have more that aim at the home and family life directly, and let us see that the arrow goes home.

Can we not urge the managers of coal companies and corporations to have welfare managers. Good men and women, who will teach the mothers how to make a home, such as existed a generation ago, for certainly in this case the old was better than the new. The influence of such a home cannot fail to be more attractive than the streets, and let us hope than saloons and pool rooms. In this home we want the old time mother, the home maker, the home keeper. She still does exist outside of books, and though she seems more rare in the present generation than in the past we will hope that she may return in the future, in spite of woman suffrage. It would almost seem that charitable funds, which are used to aid a mother to be absent from her home and children all day are misplaced, even though she is making a living for her family. Perhaps with a little more time and thought we might devise means to use this money in such a way that she could stay at home with her family, and not be wearing her life out for their creature comforts and very existence.

Old Mothers.

I love old mothers—mothers with white hair,
And kindly eyes, and lips grown softly sweet
With murmured blessings over sleeping babes.
There is something in their quiet grace
That speaks the calm of Sabbath afternoons;
A knowledge in their deep, unfaltering eyes
That far outreaches all philosophy.
Time, with caressing touch, about them weaves

The silver-threaded fairy shawl of age,
While all the echoes of forgotten songs
Seem joined to lend a sweetness to their speech.
Old mothers!—as they pass with slow-timed step,
Their trembling hands cling gently to youth's strength;
Sweet mothers!—as they pass, one sees again
Old garden-walks, old roses, and old loves.
—Charles S. Ross, in the Century.

Following Mrs. Speer's Paper President Boyne introduced Rev. J. M. Walters, of the Methodist Church of Bradford, who favored the Convention with the following Address:

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen: I want to congratulate you that amid the many problems and discussions which have come before you in this Convention you have found it in your minds to give place to a study of this question which I have been asked to bring to you at this hour, namely, that of child labor.

Institutions have a right to live, and have a right to expect the upholding of humanity when they show reasons for their living by the work which they do. It will always be true that we can say, with the late Joseph Cook, that it makes very little difference to us who made a creed as long as we know what sort of a man the creed makes. I have been asked, this very day upon our streets, what relationship if any there could possibly exist between an allied organization such as you represent and the Church which I represent.

"Are you one of my gang, yes, you're one of my gang,
And your job is the same as mine;
To fix up the earth and so forth and so forth,
And make its dull emptiness shine
The world's unfinished, let's mold it a bit,
With pick-axe and shovel and spade;
We're gentlemen diggers, and delvers of brawn
And fixing the world is our trade;
And I love the sweet sound of our pickaxe's clang,
Yes, you belong to my gang."

This is a great subject we have before us tonight. When that uncrowned King of English History was struggling for the liberation of his people from the dominance of the idea of the Divine right of kings he one day took a sword and pressed it into the hand of his growing boy and said: "Son, take this sword and fight, for if ever there was a God's battle in this world this is one."

I want to say that any institution, whether you call it a church or a charity organization or whatever you may name it, when it seeks for the liberation of men from the thralldom and slavery of ignorance and the overpowering weight placed upon them by greed, then I say that is God's battle, no matter who is in it or by what name it is called.

It may be well to notice the difference between our age and other ages, with reference to the child; because the fact that we have come to discuss child labor shows we have come much further on than the ages which have preceded us. We live in a day when there seems to be a desire to bring to us a renaissance of the old Pagan ideals. Our children are taught the philosophy of Aristotle, and yet he taught the world that a laboring man was a man to be looked upon with scorn and that a man who labored with his hands was in a debasing business. They are taught the orations of Cicero, and yet Cicero defended that bloody gladiatorial show of Rome.

That same age could put a child if it was malformed yonder upon some mountain height to be destroyed by a wild beast, and it is only when we turn aside from the pagan idealisms and come to the teachings of the Hebrew race that we find something to uplift our ideals and give comfort to our souls.

A Jewish child at five or six years of age was to begin to read the Book of the Law; when he was fifteen upon his neck was placed the commandments, or, in other words, he was made a member of the Jewish church. When he was eighteen years old he married, when he was twenty-one he went out to his trade, because no boy, no matter how rich his father was, was allowed to go out into this world unless he could earn his living with his hands. And it would be a mightly good thing if rich men's sons were taught the same today. We have two kinds of hobos in the United States: the one who gets his living from Mary Jane at the back door and the other hobo that gets his living from what his father has made. (Laughter and applause.) Neither of them add to the wealth or to the uplift of the community.

But the Hebrew lad was never allowed to work until he had passed the age of adolescence. He must be a man before he could take upon himself the burden of man's work. And the Man of Nazareth told the people of His age that none of them could expect to enter into the kingdom of heaven unless they became as a little child.

If we come to the United States and look at the last census we will find we had about nine millions and a half of children between ten and fifteen years old. About four and a half million boys or a little less, and a greater number of girls. Of these a little over one million were earning their own living; eighteen and two-tenths per cent. of the children in the United States went out to earn their own bread, three-fourths of them boys, and one-fourth girls.

Now this is the problem before us tonight. Those young people, some of them in their infancy, made to carry burdens that should be carried by full-grown men and women.

If we come to the State of Pennsylvania, this millionaire State of ours, great in its wealth, we will also find it to be among the greatest sinners in putting burdens too heavy to be borne, upon its children. This State, with its magnificent cities, with its great mines, and its magnificent men in some cases, notwithstanding that, can sell cubic feet of air for solid mahogany and build monuments for fake statesmen, puts over 22,000 little boys and 19,000 little girls into its mines and mills and stores.

There is another thing I want you to notice, that of the eighteen and two-tenths per cent. of young people earning their daily bread in the United States of America a very great percentage are so doing on the farms. I don't know whether you have stopped to consider the meaning of this or not; we sometimes say the boy or girl on the farm is under the supervision of his father and mother, but I come to you tonight as a boy from the farm. I come to you as one who was taken from school at nine years of age, and when I had to reach up to hold the handles of the plow. I was put behind the plow. As one who at fourteen years of age went out to work for my living at the immense sum of 40 cents a day. And no eight-hour days, but more than once eighteen hours in a day. And I sometimes wonder how it is that I am called to talk to an assemblage of this sort. I wonder how it is that by the mercy of God I am here, and why it is that I am not one of the sort that is out on some street corner damning the institutions of the United States and calling down the maledictions of hell upon all that is upon earth and above us. I wonder I am not anarchistic in my tendencies. I have come to see that the life of the farm boy is enough to warp his very being, and it is no wonder that many of them are swept into the vortexes of our cities, or go down into nameless graves. I am glad that that great man of ours that you haven't been able to hide away, although he is in jungles of Africa, (Applause) that among the things he tried to put in motion was one for investigating the rural portions of the country. I love the farm, because that is where I had my birth, but the farmer has some things to learn. He has to learn that his boy and girl are of more value than his sheep and pigs and cattle. Only the other day I noticed that the honest farmers in the County of Herkimer and adjacent counties of New York were trying to form a combination to control the milk business of the City of New York, and I said I hoped to the Lord God Almighty that there may be some way provided that they cannot do it; because a Trust in milk is no better than a Trust in steel, when it keeps the milk from the babies of New York. (Applause).

There is a great question of human greed. We are sometimes led to understand that the drink business is cruel in its attempts to fight that that is done for its regulation, but in the last analysis it is like every other business where money is made. I passed a great palace the other day in one of our cities, with a marble front and with magnificent stables behind, and I was given to understand that in those stables there were pails of teak wood, ornamented with gold. There are no horses in that stable today, but automobiles instead. And that man has made it all by having girls who work in his great stores at $2 a week, and if you started any movement to do away with the low wages for girls in stores that man would be ready to fight you to the very last inch, the same as the whisky business does.

I have come to a realization of the fact that the pulpit of America and organizations of America should begin to teach the world that the greatest thing in the world is not property; that it is not mines or farms, but that the greatest thing in the world today is men and women. We must teach that again and again.

Now I will notice one or two of the basic evils of child labor. First of all we realize that there are certain principles that we must follow if we are to have good stock, or good fruit. Men see that their horses and cattle shall have a chance to be well born. We plant our trees so they may have plenty of water and air; we plant a jungle when we come to dealing with humanity. In a little paper that was given to me by one of the Women's clubs of this City I read this sentence: "The future fathers and mothers, and the leaders of our race."

Ladies and gentlemen, the future fathers and mothers unfortunately they will be, because the law of the barnyard cannot be put to the law of the genus homo. The future fathers and mothers they will be, but the future leaders they cannot be. There may be a few Charles Mitchells who will rise out of the slum of their existence into a high place, but you tie a boy or girl to a machine when they are nine or ten years of age, and keep them there, and you make them machines, and by and by they will be fathers and mothers and the next generation is a puny generation. The very thing that is cursing and damning India at this time.

History always repeats itself, with reference to our treatment of our kind. You remember the vision that Shakspeare gives to Brutus. I am not sure whether Brutus saw the ghost of Caesar or not. Let Shakspeare have his way. You remember that the shade comes to Brutus' tent and Brutus says: "What are thou, some god, some angel or some devil, that makest my blood run cold and my hair to stare? Speak to me, what art thou?" "Thy evil spirit, Brutus." "Why comest thou?" "To tell thee thou shalt see me at Phillipi." "Well, then I shall see thee again?" "Ay, at Philippi."

The power of Brutus went down, and why? The Roman empire was doing what we are doing. It was debasing its children by a human slavery. The powers that were in the great democracy were getting hold of the men and women. Rome could steal like we can steal; and in that day there rose up the downtrodden men and women of Rome and in their wrath they overthrew the power of Brutus.

When ignorance rises in revolution it is blood. You remember the story of Louis the 14th and his Prime Minister. Someone said to Fulon: "What will the people eat?" and he said: "Let them eat grass." And two weeks afterwards the people cut off his head and opened his mouth and filled it with grass. So I say the uneducated, physically debased men and women will bring forth its harvest in the days to come, in a way that may make some of us tremble. A weakened, physical frame makes a weakened soul, and on the weakened, physical frame of men and women from America the saloon thrives. All kinds of base appetite thrives. A strong physical nature and an educated mind is what we need to help us fight the drink problem and the drug problem and the social problem.

The question may arise: "What can we do ourselves?" and I might indicate a few things that it is possible to do. I was delighted with the paper that was just read (Mrs. Speer's) which reminded us that the basic principles of all uplift was that old fashioned thing called religion. I am sorry to say that in Bradford we have some people who instill into the minds of growing boys and girls a very small conception of the Sabbath day. Don't let the boy drag our dirty clothes around on Sunday.

The "bargain counter" is always present, and we rush with both feet to it. There is never a bargain counter that doesn't mean a poorly-paid clerk somewhere. Let us beware of the bargain counter, and some of our so-called 5-cent stores. Let us look for the label of the Consumers' League. You all know about that. When the Russian Jew swarmed into New York and began his filthy little business, paying women a few pennies for making a pair of trousers the women of New York and of America organized the Consumers' League. And we have stores in Bradford and in all the cities that place before us clothes that can be worn with honest pride, because they have been paid for with honest money for honest toil, and if we cannot do anything else, when we buy our clothes let us look at the label.

"Do you hear the children crying, Oh, my brothers,
Ere, their sorrow come of years,
They are leaning their young heads against their mothers,
But that cannot dry their tears,
The young lambs are skipping in the meadows,
The young flowers are bending toward the west,
The young fawns are playing in the shadows,
The young birds are chirping in their nest.
But the younger children, Oh my brothers, Oh my brothers,
They are weeping bitterly,
Weeping in the playtime of the others,
In this country of the free.

In the Methodist Discipline there is an old paragraph which says: "We are opposed to slavery," and every little while someone says: "Don't you know slavery is dead?" I wish to God it were. As long as there is a little boy in the mines, or a little girl in South Carolina mills that ought to be in school, as long as there is a poor drunkard, made mad by drink, tottering down our streets, as long as there is a man or woman who does not get sufficient pay there will be slavery, and the elimination of such slavery is a consummation for which we will devoutly pray.

Ladies and gentlemen, I thank you.

The address of Rev. Walters was received with applause.

The business session was closed with prayer by Rev. Walters.

Following the business Session a brief recess was take,n to enable those in charge of the banquet to clear the Hall and arrange the tables, etc., after which at the invitation of President Boyne the delegates were seated at tables which filled the Hall, and were entertained by a very pleasing vocal solo by Mrs. Charles Luce of Bradford.

Following this Dr. J. Lewis Shrodes, who had been appointed by President Boyne as toastmaster, said:

"We have read of Sandy Flagler, in the story of Kenneth. We have found another character here today, Sandy Boyne. (Laughter and applause). I think it would be a shame to lose the benefit of his scintilating wit, and I would like to have someone move that I return this gavel to him and ask him to act as toast master this evening.

Upon motion of Mr. Osche that President Boyne act as toast master Dr. Shrodes handed him the gavel and after remarks by President Boyne which kept the delegates in a continuous roar of laughter Mayor Hoffman was called upon, also Mrs. Lindsey, Mr. Colborn and Dr. Shrodes, and the evening was spent in a pleasant manner, many delegates remarking that the Convention at Bradford would long be remembered for the entertainment afforded, as well as for the work done.

REPORT OF BLAIR COUNTY HOSPITAL

Number of patients in Hospital October 1, 1908, 130; number of admissions to Hospital October 1, 1908 to October 1, 1909, 131.

Number discharged October 1, 1908 to October 1, 1909, 46; number deaths, 21; number paroles, 34.

Number patients in Hospital October 1, 1909, 200; capacity of hospital, 220; number attendants, 14; supervisor, 1; head nurse, 1; cook, (2 inmates assist) 1.

Work since January 1.—About 250 trees planted; about 900 square yards of sod planted on terraces; about 8,000 cubic yards of earth moved for grading purposes; a seven acre truck patch started; 1,200 tons lime stone crushed for road making; excavations and grading for about 2,000 feet of roading, 15 feet wide with a stone bed 11 to 18 inches deep. The road is only partially completed. (The above work was practically all done by patient labor). A store room was established and a system of requisitions by the different departments was inaugurated, completing a perfect system of following up each item received into and disbursed from the store room.

Ninety-one mattresses were made by patients, using African fibre in place of hair or choir, cost, about $1.69 1-2 each.

One hundred and thirty steel guards were put in place of as many inadequate wire guards, several patients having escaped by forcing the wire guards.

CONSTITUTION

The following is the Constitution of the Association as amended from time to time by the members. See proceedings of meetings of 1877, 1882, 1886, 1890, 1892, 1896, 1900, 1901, 1902, and 1903 in regard to Meetings, Membership, Legislation, Committees, Name of Association, Delegates to National Conference, Assistant Secretary, Secretary, and Treasurer.

Article 1. This organization shall be known as the "Association of Directors of the Poor and Charities of Pennsylvania."

Article 2. The members of this organization shall consist of the Directors, Guardians, and Overseers of the Poor of the several Poor Districts of the State, their Attorneys, Physicians, and Clerks, and all who have at any time served as such; the Officers of the Almshouse in the State; the Governor and the heads of Departments and the Judges of the Courts; the members of the Board of Public Charities and Committee of Lunacy; Superintendents and Managers of the several Insane Hospitals; Training Schools for Feeble-Minded Children; Trustees and Officers of Children's Home; Blind Schools, Deaf and Dumb, and Reformatory Schools; all officers and members of Children's Aid Socities, and all persons connected with Charitable and Benevolent Institutions or Associations.

Article 3. The object of the Association shall be that of investigating and considering all questions concerning pauperism and dependency, to devise means for the prevention of the same, and for the improvement and managment of the Charitable Institutions; care and treatment of the insane; look after the care of all delinquent, poor, afflicted and feeble-minded children; to suggest and recommend legislation relating thereto; to establish personal acquaintance betwen Directors of the Poor of the several Districts, Counties, and Institutions, and so far as possible, for the comparison of their different systems of management and observation and visitation of Almshouses and Institutions.

Article 4. Its officers shall consist of a President, seven Vice Presidents, a Secretary, Assistant Secretary, Treasurer, who shall be elected annually and hold their respective offices until their successors are elected and have signified their acceptance of the office; the Secretary and Treasurer shall be held by the same person.

Article 5 Their several duties shall be such as usually pertain to those official positions, and they shall be governed by such parliamentary rules as are usually recognized.

Article 6. The Association shall hold annual meetings on the second or third week in October of each year, and at such place as may be agreed upon by the members at the regular meeting.

Article 7. In addition to the officers named in Article 4, the President is empowered to appoint at the opening of each annual meeting a committee of seven to select officers for the ensuing year, subject to the approval of the Association; an Auditing Committee of three, a committee of seven to select a place for holding of the next annual Convention, and a committee of seven on Legislation; a committee of seven on Resolutions. The President elect at each meeting, in addition to the named committees shall appoint a committee of five persons, one of whom shall be the Secretary, who shall prepare the program for the meetings and notify the members of the assignment of duty on the program, and in addition thereto, with the consent of the Executive Committee, invite such persons from within or without the State to make addresses on such topics as may be of interest to the Association, said committee to serve during his term.

Article 8. The President shall have power and is authorized to appoint two members of the Association as delegates to the National Conference of Charities and Corrections. The President shall be an Ex Officia Delegate with power of substitution. The expenses of said Delegates for attending said Conference shall be paid by the Association, not to exceed, however, One Hundred Dollars.

Article 9. The President, Vice Presidents, and Secretaries shall constitute a Permanent Executive Committee to arrange businss of the Association.

Article 10. The Treasurer shall pay out the funds of the Association on order of the President and Secretary. The Secretary shall receive Fifty Dollars for his expenses, and the Treasurer shall receive Twenty-five Dollars per year.

Article 11. The Treasurer shall submit his account at each meeting with the vouchers, which shall be audited by the Auditing Committee appointed for that purpose.

Article 12. The expenses necessary for the holding of each meeting shall be assessed on each Poor District, Institution, and Society, the amount as recommended by the Auditing Comimttee, and approved by the Association, which amounts shall be paid to the Treasurer

Article 13. Any person interested in the work of the Association will be admitted as an honorary member by a majority of the members present.

Article 14. This Constitution may be amended at any regular meeting by a majority vote of the members present.

Thirty-sixth Annual Convention

OF THE

ASSOCIATION OF

Directors of the Poor and Charities

Of the State of Pennsylvania

HELD IN

Y. M. C. A. HALL, WILLIAMSPORT, PA.

October 11th, 12th, and 13th

The Thirty-sixth Annual Convention of the Directors of the Poor and Charities of Pennsylvania convened in Y. M. C. A. Hall at Williamsport, Pa., on Tuesday morning, October 11, 1910, at 9:30 a. m., and after half an hour spent in registering and forming acquaintances, etc., the convention was called to order by President N. Boyd Wilson, of Williamsport.

During the assembling of the Delegates, and before the convention was called to order, very delightful music was rendered by Miss Jennie Durrwachter, Miss Anabel Burman, and Miss Emma Durrwachter, members of the Klieman Orchestra, of Williamsport.

Rev. Evor Evans, of the Congregational Church, offered prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, we thank Thee for this beautiful day. It is the day Thou hast made, and in it we will rejoice and be exceeding glad. We rejoice that we are called to do Thy will at this time, in this crucial day of our social development. Fill our hearts with Thy peace and help us to know that what we are to accomplish we shall accomplish not by our own power, but through the wisdom and strength we receive from Thee. Not by human light, not by humanly-devised plans and methods, but by Thy Spirit shall Thy will be accomplished in this world, even as it is done in heaven. Fill our hearts with Thy praise as we take account of stock and devise ways and means of advancing the cause of righteousness and helping the needy in our communities. Bless Thy children wherever they are stationed. Give them faith in Thee, and when our days shall end and we are summoned into the presence of the Loving Master may we each render an account that will bring from Him, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joys of thy Lord." We ask it in the name of Jesus, and for His sake. Amen.

President Wilson: I am very sorry that our Mayor could not be with us this morning. He was called out of the city, but he has left his address to be read.

President Wilson here read the following address and greeting of Hon. Charles Wolfe, Mayor of Williamsport, which was received with applause:

MAYOR WOLFE'S GREETING.

Mr. N. Boyd Wilson, President State Association of Charities.

My Dear Sir: I regret that it is not possible for me to be present in person to extend to your distinguished delegates, as Mayor of this city, the cordial greetings of the municipality and the freedom of the city during their stay within our gates.

Please convey to them for me the assurance that we are glad to have them here and hope that they may have an agreeable sojourn in every particular. We are highly favored, not only in having the convention come to Williamsport for its thirty-sixth annual session, but are proud of the special distinction of having one of our substantial citizens and Directors in the office of President of the Association for the present year. We feel justified in saying that the organization has honored itself in both selections.

Whatever rank our city may take in the provision it makes for caring for its needy and helpless classes, of one thing we fell assured—namely, our citizens meet cheerfully and promptly the demands made upon their resources for this purpose. The public and the official representatives of the people commend and heartily approve of the general policy of our Board of Overseers of the Poor, and of the erection and management of the City Home.

It is safe to say that among the results of this meeting the delegates will be given some valuable suggestions by a study of what is being done here.

The problem of dealing with the unfortunate classes in a manner least burdensome to the taxpayers, and for the best interests of those to whom relief is afforded, calls for the best efforts of those upon whom the work devolves.

The question calls for the exercise of intelligence, prudence, and a display of sympathy accompanied and guided by practical business methods.

The task of dispensing charity from the funds of the taxpayers as a body is a very important and delicate work and should be done upon the most approved methods that experience and public policy may suggest.

That such ends are being sought for by those engaged in this work is shown by the holding of these annual conventions.

Trusting that your meeting here will be of great benefit to all, and again bidding the convention a hearty, cordial, and warm greeting, I am with best wishes,

Yours truly,

CHAS. D. WOLFE, Mayor.

The reading of the Mayor's welcome was followed by more mandolin and piano music by the same young ladies.

President Wilson next introduced Mr. Frank P. Cummings, City Solicitor of Williamsport, who addressed the convention as follows:

ADDRESS OF WELCOME.

Mr. President, Ladies, and Gentlemen.

It is a matter of exceeding regret that his Honor, Mayor Wolfe, was obliged to be absent on account of a demand made at the last hour upon his time, and in order that some official member of the executive family be present I appear before you, summoned hastily from the courtroom, to say a word.

It is rarely the privilege of any person in my position to address a convention with which we as city officials come in touch, that is composed so largely as this is of the ladies. I am pleased to observe that in a cause that comes so close to humanity, and to the human heart, so close to the fireside, and that is exalted by such tender ministries, that woman participates to the extent evidenced here. It has been said that woman is the first at the cradle and the last at the grave; and in all the trying ordeals and vicissitudes of public life, and in the dispensing of alms or the carrying out of the provisions for the care of the unfortunate there is no doubt that woman, with all her sympathy and all her tender judgment can and will vastly assist in the work that falls to you. I am like many others who go about our streets and who only read in the public press some of the workings of those who are in charge of the poor. It is unfortunate that we, as citizens, know so little of a matter that is so broad and so essential to society and to Christian life. So in your conventions when you come together for the promotion of your work you accomplish a twofold object: You accomplish the object that is always accomplished in conventions like this, of the interchange of thought and the comparing of theories; of the benefits which arise from this comparison of theories, and the data you obtain from the results of your work.

There is another thing you accomplish. You bring home to the people the fact that there is such a labor going on; that we have the poor and that we have Overseers of the Poor, and that it is the citizen's place to listen and to think; so I am glad, as a representative to some extent of the municipality, to say to you that you are indeed cordially and warmly welcomed to the City of Williamsport. We have all kinds of conventions here, from the political convention down through the various channels, but rarely does such a convention as this meet with us. The poor you have always with you. They always will be with us. You are not stimulating a work that will help in politics; you are not working for a fraternal brother who may be promoting some social or economical question, but you are reaching down from the plane of business and from the church circle and the moral circle and extending a hand to the unfortunate, to aid him, and to dispense the funds that you are entrusted with. You have, indeed, a great trust. In the olden times the old were allowed to die when they could fight no longer, and the poor were cast out, but in modern times the great heart of humanity began to feel and to know that there are those who must be cared for. It often occurs that, no matter what may be your talent or your industry, yet in the struggle for bread misfortune may come. You know better than I that people of talent and of social standing have been brought almost to asking for cold pieces.

It has been well said that "God has written upon the flower that sweetens the air, upon the breeze that rocks the flower on its stem, upon the raindrops which swell the mighty river, upon the dewdrops that refreshes the smallest sprig of moss that rears its head in the desert, upon the ocean that rocks every swimmer in its chambers, upon every penciled shell that sleeps in the caverns of the deep, as well as upon the mighty sun which warms and cheers the millions of creatures that live in its light—upon all hath He written, 'None of us liveth to himself.'" And so you in your labors promote that principle that no one of us liveth to himself.

Therefore, ladies and gentlemen, on behalf of his Honor, the Mayor, and in behalf of the city administration and of the people of Williamsport I want to say to you that you are heartily welcome. You have honored us by the distinction of placing in the chair, to preside over your meetings, our friend, Mr. Wilson, who has had a long and honorable career as a citizen of Williamsport, and who has discharged with credit to himself the duties of Overseer of the Poor. Therefore, you have honored us in coming here and honored us in the choice of your President.

The city is yours. I trust your stay will be profitable and pleasant and that you will carry home kind memories of Williamsport, the Queen City of the West Branch.

Applause.

Mr. Colborn: I am pleased to introduce to you Dr. J. Lewis Srodes, of Woodville, Pa., who will respond to these warm greetings.

ADDRESS OF DR. SRODES.

Dr. Srodes was received with applause and said:

Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen, members of the Association, and citizens of Williamsport.

I regard this as a very great honor. I regard it also as a very great privilege to respond to the welcome I have just heard. Williamsport has a reputation as a convention city, of which we have some knowledge. This isn't the first time this Association has had the benefit of Williamsport hospitality. Nineteen years ago this Association met here, and at that time, and in all times as far back as philanthropic work has existed, it has been the chief object of all work of that kind to devise ways and means of keeping the wolf from the door. This morning Williamsport has probably attempted to show us what a change has come over the spirit of our dreams in years gone by—and while it is true the Wolfe isn't here to welcome you in person, he has sent a letter. The invitation to you to attend here is not a merely perfunctory matter, but has an expression of heart in it, and to prove this I call attention to the fact that, among others, it is signed by William Hart, President Judge. You will also find the name of William H. Kiess. I suppose that was intended as the kiss of welcome that you would receive. When the President announced that the speaker wasn't here at the time, but if the young ladies would furnish a little muisc that he would soon be coming, I suppose it was Frank B. Cummings. (Laughter).

As an official representative of the Association I am very glad to express my appreciation, in behalf of the Association, for the welcome that we have received. I am sure they will go still further, and for all these pleasures they will furnish the cups from which to drink.

Applause.

Mr. L. C. Colborn: Reference has been made by Mr. Cummings to the ladies. The lady who was to respond to the address of welcome, on the part of the Children's Aid Society, Mrs. Vantine, was detained at home by the sickness of her husband, but she has delegated the matter to one who is equal to the task. I have the pleasure of introducing Mrs. A. P. Bowie, of the Children's Aid Society of Fayette County.

ADDRESS OF MRS. BOWIE.

I come before you, not as one who has attained honor, but rather as one who has had honor thrust upon them. I have had no time for preparation and I hope you will not expect a speech.

In the name of the Children's Aid Society I thank you all for your kind words of welcome and greeting. We feel ourselves to be the ounce of prevention which is worth the pound of cure. If we can take the little children and place them in loving homes they will not come to your reformatories, almshouses, and penitentiaries. We have to often change children from one home to another and sometimes we fail and the child comes to you; but we do the best we can.

I thank you again, and I trust we will so conduct ourselves that you will not be sorry that you invited us here, and we hope to receive much help in our work.

Applause.

The convention was again favored with music by the same young ladies.

President Wilson here read the following "President's Annual Address," which was received with applause:

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

Ladies and Gentlemen, Members of the Thirty-sixth Annual Convention of the Association of Directors of the Poor and Charities of Pennsylvania.

I need not assure you, or long dwell upon the fact that it gives me exceedingly great pleasure to welcome to our city the delegates of this convention, as well as their friends and supporters. Williamsport has long been known as a convention city, and because of its superior location, the accessibility of its position, and the hospitality of its people has been made the mecca of many organizations as a place of deliberation in their annual meetings and conventions.

The President of your organization can have no very close affiliation or relation with the various bodies and organizations which send delegates to these conventions, and is thus handicapped in attempting to describe or outlines any progress which has been made by any of the organizations which are allied to or support the State organization, and he, therefore, cannot, with any degree of accuracy, or with much profit, give anything but in the most general terms of the condition of the Association from the time of its last meeting in Bradford to the time of its present convention in Williamsport.

I, of course, recognize the great honor which was conferred upon me at Bradford by my election as your President. With all positions of honor there is necessarily responsibility. I would have very much preferred to have had elected to this position some one more qualified to perform the duties required of your presiding officer, and as well some one who would have been more capable of exercising the office than I have or will be able to do. But be this as it may, I can only assure you of my earnest desire and purpose to do the best I can under the circumstances, hoping that my desire, good wishes, and good feeling toward the organization will in a measure be substituted and stand for my unpreparedness for the position. The various committees which have worked in furtherance of this convention have made their plans and arrangements in such manner as I believe will most effectually make for a profitable, harmonious, and pleasant meeting and convention. We shall endeavor to entertain you as best we can and have no doubt that your stay here will be one that will be remembered with much pleasure.

The program which has been prepared is full of interesting topics for discussion, interspersed with other numbers of a pleasing character, and with continuing fair weather and other brightening auspices, we cannot but be benefited and improved by our gathering together for the purpose of discussing and acting upon such matters as make for the betterment of our people, and the alleviation of the conditions of the poor and unfortunate.

In this connection it might be well to state that the nineteenth annual session of the Association was held in this city and since then some have answered the final summons. But we are happy to know that our organization is growing in numbers, and its influence for the betterment of conditions, affecting those who are dependent on public charity is almost national in its scope, and let us still further endeavor to advance the interest of those whose welfare our Association stands for—"the destitute."

The work challenging the attention and care of the Directors of the Poor is not always pleasant to contemplate or execute, and at times little appreciated either by the public or the recipients of the charity, but the progress made and the work done along these lines has been such that when we study the reports of the State Board of Charities and the educational powers of this Association we cannot help but be encouraged in our work.

There is no direction in which human ingenuity has been more exerted than in its endeavor to improve the condition of the poor, and very much of the unjust criticism which is sometimes attached to the actions of the Directors of the Poor might be spared them if laws governing and conditions to be met were better understood by the general public.

At the conclusion of the President's address Hon. H. Frank Eshleman, of Lancaster, was introduced by the President, and addressed the convention as follows:

ADDRESS OF MR. ESHLEMAN.

Our Duty to Our Insane, Deficient and Pauper Wards.

Poets, patriots, politicians, publicists, and political economists all agree that, not only the schools and colleges, but also the jails, almshouses and asylums, the prisons and penitentiaries are the truest marks of an enlightened nation. Civil progress both extracts the excellent, the good, and boils the bad out of human life. Both culture and crime come, therefore, with civilization; diligence, drunkenness and dementia, driving the same car arrive the hour and dwell, from the first, in the same neighborhood and even in the same family; learning and lunacy live in the same ambitious age and on the same attractive acres; and arm in arm with industry come idleness and insanity. Thus we cannot hope to be freed from either crime, insanity, or pauperism as we advance our civilization and enlarge and extend our enlightenment. No matter how society improve, we shall never be rid of crime, pauperism, and insanity. The refinement of our civilization and the growing intensity of life and the modern order of things, while they may lessen crime somewhat, will only breed insanity faster and pinch more pauperism out of the people. The pauper and the insane will never be things of the past for "the poor ye have with you always;" and the high tension of progress will continue to breed ruined minds.

Not only will the problem of the pauper and the insane be forever with us, but it will always be a tremendously big and partly insolvable problem. It will always cost millions annually and bring distress alike to those who are to be supported and those who must support them.

It is a problem, too, in which more injustice is likely to flow from over-enthusiasm for, than from neglect of, these dependents. There is much popular sympathy for them; there are willing legislators and experts to provide elaborate plants, costly entirely out of proportion to the actual remedy and comfort they effect; there are enthusiastic medical specialists and others who make the subject a hobby and who demand establishments often fundamentally defective and yet expensive out of proportion to other lawful demands on the public; there are legal requirements whereby the inmates undoubtedly get better food, better warmth and many more conveniences than fully fifty per cent of the people outside, struggling to keep their families, and make ends meet; and who, at the same time they carry a heavy mortgage or other lien, are helping to support the inmates. Christian men and women are naturally full of sympathy for these unfortunates—so are we all. But the care of the poor and insane must not be made an emotional matter any more than the schools, or indeed, than any of the other functions of government must be. It must be a matter of strict justice to the sufferer and to the citizen alike—to pauper and to the public equally. It must be a matter of business. I know this is not popular. But it is right; for justice is always right.

Taking the advice of Webster, in opening his great reply to Hayne that, before discussing a subject one should first make a survey of the whole, and inform himself upon the dimensions of it—its length and breadth and depth and upon the essential parts and points and main proportions of it—let us take a survey of the general course of pauperism and of insanity and of their main features in the United States in the last quarter century.

A reliable authority states the number of almshouse paupers in 1890 in our country to be 73,000 and in 1904 to be 81,764. The number in the United States seems to be stationary, viz: 116 in every 100,000 people, or a little over one-tenth of one per cent. England has ten times as many as we have (N. Y. World Almanic, 1892 and 1910).

As to insanity and other deficiencies the same authority informs us there were 91,959 insane in the asylums of our country in 1880—about 106,485 in 1890 and about 150,151 in 1904. There are perhaps not over 50,000 other insane in the country. Hospitals increased from 162 in 1890 to 328 in 1904; that is, they more than doubled in 13 years. Of these, 226 are public asylums and 102 private (World Almanac, 1898 and 1910).

We are informed, too, that in 1880 there were 400 out of every 100,000 foreigners in our country insane; 160 out of every 100,000 native whites and 91 out of every 100,000 negroes; and that in 1903 there were 387 out of every 100,000 foreigners here insane; 140 out of every 100,000 native whites and 88 out of every 100,000 negroes (World Almanac).

If this statement be true, the percentage of insanity is decreasing—the proportion of insane to the whole population is smaller now than it was 25 years ago. We have seen that in 1880 there were 160 of every 100,000 of our native whites insane and in 1890 only 140. Among white foreigners here the proportion was also 13 less per 100,000 and among negroes three less. But the insane in asylums doubled as well as the asylums themselves. Let us remember this as a basis of discussion later. The annual cost of maintenance in asylums was put at $21,000,000 about five years ago.

It seems the greatest number of our insane come to asylums between 25 and 35 years of age; a little less than 53 per cent of the insane are men and a little over 47 per cent women. Of the insane 41 per cent come from laborers and servants, 16 per cent from those engaged in manufacture and mechanical arts; 15 per cent from agriculturists; 7 per cent from those engaged in commerce and transportation, and the remaining 21 per cent from the professions and thousands of other activities.

In addition to the 150,000 insane in asylums there are about 14,000 of our 130,000 feeble-minded in asylums. There are also 40,500 deaf and dumb and 50,500 blind in our country. So that there are a total of from 425,000 to half a million deficients in our country of whom about 200,000 or more are supported and administered to in hospitals and asylums. Of the insane alone over three-fourths are in asylums, and also a large proportion of weak-minded.

Having made these general observations upon the subject, let us notice a few needs and improvements that will help, in a just and fair manner, both those supported in almshouses and asylums and those whose money must support them.

As to pauperism we cannot say much with profit. The pauper does not cost very much because few attendants and little medical attention are needed in his case. Further, a great number of them leave and find light employment with farmers, etc., during the summer. All those who can work and are not entirely worn out should be required to contribute to the expense of their keeping; either in the almshouses, which are generally made workhouses by law, or by being put out the same as children are bound out. There is one thing, however, the State owes its paupers in the same manner as and for the same beneficent effect that the parent owes his child, an occasional chastisement. The pauper who makes himself a pauper or contributes greatly to that end, should be stigmatized. Not less than half of our paupers come to that condition through drink and other disreputable courses of life. A history of pauperism will show that thousands of old worn-out men must go to the almhouse because when they were in middle life, their conduct toward their families was so reprehensible that when the parent became old the children felt no obligation to care for them. There are thousands of cases in which the parent by neglect of his family and using them brutally—by drunkenness and squandering his money—by beating his wife and offespring—by desertion of his young family—by "liaisons" with "strange women"—by hiring his children out, and not giving them enough out of their wages for clothes—by laziness and refusal to work when he was strong, compelling his family to keep him—has entirely forfeited his right (in the minds of his family) to any support from them. The most frequent complaint made by children when prosecuted by parents for support is that the father abandoned them when small or abused them, in drunkenness or by the other means which I have mentioned, forfeited his moral right to any support from them. Thus in those cases in which the children are too poor to have an order made against them by Court the burden falls on the county. In many instances which I have seen, children who are too poor and whose families are too large to make them liable to an order of Court to support parents, nevertheless would voluntarily support the father if he had been a father to them in earlier life. And thus I could go on explaining the necessity for what I am about to declare. But it is not necessary.

To my mind, one very just result should follow upon the heels of the pauperism, of the parent who by any of the means which I have mentioned brings or helps to bring himself to be an inmate of a county poorhouse—a public pauper. All those who have thus brought on, or largely helped to bring on their own pauperism and disgrace should be separated from those who are paupers from pure misfortune or act of God; and should be in a ward by themselves, known as a disreputable or semi-criminal or delinquent ward. The distinction which stigmatizes them should run all through their treatment. They should wear a badge or mark of their delinquency in the shape of a distinct kind of clothes—their ward, besides being separate, should be labeled and their place of dining should be separate, either a separate room or separate tables, from the others.

There is no injustice in this. No man has the right when he has made himself a delinquent or semi-criminal to expect the commiseration and sympathy of the public upon whom he has burdened himself. He is entirely different from one who by reason of sickness or other act of God or misfortune must throw himself upon public charity.

This course is just because the delinquent pauper should be made to reflect upon his course of life and repent it, the same as one who is in jail being punished for fraud; it is just, because it would be a warning to those who are now on the road to self-imposed pauperism, admonishing them that they will be accounted public criminals if they land in the poorhouse from such conduct and fail to mend their ways; it is just, because many families of children who are willing to allow aged parents to go to the poorhouse, since they feel no particular stigma attaches to it, would stand horrified of it, the same as of a yawning prison, as they should; it is just, because thereby there may be a reaction against the growing dangerous loosening of the family relation so prevalent in our day; it is just, because it would to some extent relieve the public from payment of poor taxes, especially those commendable and honest poor men who are manfully working to keep out of the almshouse, carrying a load of debt and paying taxes and at the same time, not enjoying in life one-half of the comfort of those who are taken care of in the almshouse; it is just, because it would give a merited rebuke and setback to the foolish, effeminate, sentimentality pervading the public and perverting the legislator which to-day is tending to make jails hotels, as observed by President Taft, and poor establishments palaces, and is placing a lot of disgusting, sickening sentiment in advance of common sense, while a mass of heavily taxed people are groaning under the weight of it and paying the bills.

I am only advocating the merit system. Those who have manfully done their duty in life and worked and honestly labored and through misfortune have fallen by the way, I would also have some badge, indicating that they were noble, honorable men and valuable citizens in their day and that they are loved and respected now.

When we turn to insanity we have a more serious and important question to deal with. And there are several particulars of the question which we may consider with profit.

We direct our attention to the point hinted at a few minutes ago that it is not, perhaps, a fact that insanity is growing at a much more rapid rate than population, but that the policy of removing all grades of insane from the family and placing them in asylums has grown tremendously. We revert to the fact that, while in ten years the proportion of insane foreigners here decreased 13 per 100,000, and of the insane native whites 20 per 100,000, and of insane negroes 3 per 100,000, the numbers in insane asylums increased from about 75,000 to 150,000 and the asylums themselves increased from 162 to 328 in those same ten years. If this is true what interpretation shall we put upon it?

The answer is, this is another of the sad evidences that the family relation is changing in our country, the family ties weakening and the family pride declining. The growth of divorce, until to-day they reach upwards of 60,000 annually; and the number of divorces granted per 100,000 people increasing from 38 in 1880 to 73 in 1900, or more than 100 per cent (World Almanac, 1910, page 349) are proofs of the same truth.

Similarly to-day we find that families whose earlier generation would not under any circumstances allow a weak-minded or peacefully or harmlessly insane son, daughter, or parent to go to a public asylum, to-day are very anxious to remove the unfortunate member out of the family and put him in the public asylum or keep him (in some cases) in a public asylum at private expense. It is the experience of all of us here that a majority of the inmates of our insane asylums are made up of mild cases, and of weak-minded victims. Both of these classes, as we can all testify, can work on the public farm in a very intelligent and faithful way and enjoy it. They never do and never will do any injury to themselves, or to anyone else. They would be better among their kin and loved ones at home and would be producers there, whereas they are consumers only in the public asylum. In this I refer only to such as cannot be and never are cured in the public asylum.

The law contemplates that only those insane who are likely to be dangerous if left at large, either to themselves or others, should be kept in public asylums. And that is a correct policy. A private family does not have the right to load upon the public every inconvenient feature in their fold. It is not fair to the public. People rebel, and rightly so, against paying out their money to the government, except for the primal needs of government. Expensive government is one of America's great sins.

The fault lies with the examining physicians. The public is not represented. They report and certify many persons insane and dangerous who, while they are demented, are not dangerous. The thing to do is to clean out those who do not belong in the asylum and take good care of the remainder. I repeat, the public under the law as it is to-day, is not required to take care of all the insane, but those only who are dangerous because insane. And if that was not the law, it ought to be the law.

Let us be warned that any and all steps having a tendency to assist in weakening family love and in removing the sense of family obligation, will tend to bring about greater and more dreadful evils in this country, than if every one of the 200,000 inmates of insane asylums and madhouses were all thrown upon the public and left there unchecked. Back to the family should go 25 per cent of all the inmates of asylums to-day, because they were not legally taken out of the family. Then the State could take proper care of the balance.

With the plain facts before us that the asylum habit is growing much faster than population, that prices have greatly advanced and that the Legislature and the Governor are compelled every time the Assembly sit, to cut down the demands made by all sections and all institutions for appropriations and money to take care of the insane—we owe it to all wards of the State, pauper and insane, to make the money that is raised go as far as possible. The extent to which money is wasted measures the extent either to which our wards uselessly suffer, or the extent to which our people are uselessly compelled to submit to taxation and support for these ends. If the moneys appropriated and raised are not as large as needed, then the first moral duty of the managers of the State's wards, a duty owed as well to the taxpayers as to the wards, is to look for methods to make the money in hand go as much farther as possible. And taking Pennsylvania as a whole, I am convinced that, the same money now consumed annually for public maintenance of the insane, sick, and pauper classes can be made to do 25 per cent more work than it does now.

The principal means by which this can be done is to enforce a strictly wholesale method in buying supplies, based as far as possible upon competitive bids. I need not stop to argue that wholesale prices are from 15 to 30 per cent below retail prices. And I surely need to spend no time in proving that an institution in a county consuming $25,000 to $50,000 and more worth of supplies annually, is a fit consumer to discard retail buying entirely. And yet we have disgusting examples by the hundreds of institutions consuming such quantities of supplies, presenting to county authorities and the public for payment, little drug bills of $5.00, coffee bills for 20 pounds, grocery bills for a mere bastketful variety of 10 or 15 samples of sugar, starch, cheese, raisins, peaches, macaroni, etc., from little high-priced retail shops, when the public quotations all around us in 10,000 newspapers show us we are paying 30 to 40 per cent more than we should by this method.

Why do we do it? Because we follow the wrong political economy in determining that, as many citizens of the public as possible should have a chance to supply public institutions. This is wrong. It is not a hundred shopkeepers who should benefit in the conduct of these institutions, but 50,000 citizens, and also the inmates themselves. But by such a petty huckstering method of supply, the public and the inmates get no benefit—they are the two classes that suffer.

Another argument is that the political conditions demand this. The answer I make is that all the political leaders of the State would welcome a deliverance from this bad and unbusinesslike business with as much joy as they did the abolishing two sets of primaries and elections each year in Pennsylvania. Politicians are the same as we are, and they hate the miserable system which is wasteful and expensive. I belive in party rule and I believe in organization in the party and in being hide-bound to the party and to the organization. For without allegiance to such party and organization nothing can be accomplished. But there is no business or political advantage in a method that may insure support of a score of small retailers and engender the disgust of a thousand voters. Nor do those retailers, as a rule care for little sops given to them. They have told me that it means little to them.

No great hotel company, no business concern, no big commercial house, no railroad, no large business of any kind in these days could carry on a single year by following a retail method of buying its stock of goods and supplies. They would all go into bankruptcy. But the public cannot become insolvent. It can merely suffer and go on paying bills.

What is the remedy? There are some counties and municipalities brave enough to enforce the remedy of wholesale buying, as business men should do, and they are safe and immune from any complaint on the part of the people and never need blush to reveal all their accounts. There are other sections and institutions which are afraid for political reasons to put the purchasing end of their plant on a business basis, while in all other respects they have the finest plant that can be found anywhere. There are scores of stewards and superintendents if they were given the right and the duty to purchase by the most economical means, would be glad and happy to do so and would, in the richer counties, save $10,000 a year and in the poorer ones at least $5,000.

Again, I ask what is the remedy that would reach the entire State alike? Simply this—a law passed providing that whenever any money is appropriated by the State to public or private charity of any kind that it should (1) be appropriated and paid out only on condition that the institution receipting for it should covenant to expend it by wholesale or by a method guaranteeing purchases by wholesale prices; (2) requiring an accounting and proofs by affidavits, etc., that the moneys paid out by the State Treasurer for one quarter was so spent and that all other moneys raised by county taxes or by any other means, consumed during that quarter for supplies were likewise so spent, in buying supplies by wholesale and where possible by competitive prices, before he should be allowed to advance the next quarterly sum of the appropriation due; (3) that the statute so passed should, by its terms, be read into every appropriation made and should also be so read into each appropriation by the terms of the appropriation itself as a condition precedent and that only upon a compliance with it would the appropriation be valid. In short, the cure is a law providing that no money be appropriated unless both the moneys locally raised and the moneys appropriated be expended in purchases at wholesale and whenever feasible by competitive prices. Its violation should forfeit the appropriation. This would reach all the poor and insane establishments of our State whether created under general or special statutes.

Another evil should be reminded. There is a tendency to put into the constructions of plants and establishments to care for the poor and insane, a lot of expensive show features, which costs thousands and thousands of dollars, but do not tell in the effective quality of the plant. They please the eye only—there are corners and crevices which require paint and repair and cut up and waste room and space and help to make the per capita cost of maintenance of each pauper and patient more than individual boarding in private families could be had for. I do not mean that it would be feasible to board these wards out privately, but I do mean that if any plant or set of buildings are so arranged and equipped that when thus assembled and centralized the care of the unfortunate is per capita more expensive than when dispersed, there is a radical defect in it. A great plant starts crumbling to pieces as soon as built and repair bills are constant and consuming. One marvels at every board meeting where all the paint and boards and nails and hardware and machinery and skilled labor are used. All that is merely ornamental; all that is complicating; all that decays and deteriorates quickly; all that makes exposure to weather large, etc; all that in equipment though convenient, is liable to get out of order should be eliminated. We need no "conveniences" that do not save expense.

The force of attendants by law to-day is made large. Laws are framed by those who have made the care of the insane a study and it seems to me they have become so enthusiastic about what belongs to the insane that they overlook the taxpayers' side and put the care of the pauper insane on the basis of insane who have an estate, which estate can afford to give to the patient a $10 or $15 per week treatment. These specialists in insanity let their enthusiasm make them feel that the public can afford such care, too. The public cannot do so.

In my experience I find the public views toward the care of our insane and pauper to be largely two classes. One class emotionally inclined immediately cry out, "Give the poor unfortunates the best of everything." The other class says, "Consider the taxpayer and do not give to the wards of the public any more than what will keep them. They must put up with at least as many hardships and discomforts as we who pay for their support must bear. They have a better life of it than we; they have heated bedrooms and not one-half of our country people have that." And thus they continue the comparison. Now these are all citizens and have a right to have their views considered.

I am convinced, upon making a study of my own locality, that part of our increase in insanity patients is due to an increased readiness to send the unfortunate members of the family to the public institution more than to actual increase of insanity. And I know locally of cases where in the present generation fathers have taken insane sons to public institutions, while the grandfathers in the same families would not consent that their demented sons should go. I may assert this also with safety that a county taking care of its insane at home will have many more to care for and more money to pay than if such county paid for the maintenance in some distant State institution. This is so because families who would not think of allowing a demented member to go to an institution in a distant town or city very freely agree to put them on the public in the nearby county seat or county asylum. My own county learned that lesson very thoroughly.

I now beg your indulgence to speak briefly upon two important subjects in connection with our insane establishments, after which I shall close.

One of the important needs of the day seems to be the separation of tubercular insane from the others. This is not a suggestion that a costly new building should be erected. All that would be needed is a roof upon strong supports, and that roof with plenty of skylights in it. The sides need only be canvas. In such tent the consumptives should sleep all the year round, wrapped in warm blankets in winter. They should eat there except in the four cold months. The heat saved in heating sleeping rooms which this effeminate age demands would be a gain. It is a strange fact that we do not profit by Nature's cures, but will persist in furnishing heat for the germs in bedrooms to live upon so that they may make us their victims.

Secondly, a few counties (very few) have demonstrated that a properly managed farm of about the size of 200 acres to every 100,000 population of the county will sustain (with the aid of the present State appropriation) the insane of such county. This (together with getting out of the asylums the percentage of inmates who are there illegally as I have before shown) is the solution of the insane burden problem. I am told Chester County is practically doing it and one or two others may approximate it. But in many of the remainder of the counties upwards of one-fourth of the total moneys raised by county tax goes to support the county asylum and hospital. The farmer must go into the truck business and raise a large lot of beans and peas and similar products, which the women may shell in the winter and the county sell. And a farmer who was willing and who was encouraged could produce $20,000 off of every 100 acres; of which 75 per cent could be clear.

And now to conclude, I know that much that I have said may be misinterpreted to mean that we should not have much feeling in regard to the unfortunates whom God has afflicted and inflicted on us. It is not so to be understood. I have simply tried to view the question from all sides and not alone from the viewpoint of an enthusiast upon any one feature of the problem. Wherever there is a possibility of a permanent cure of an insane extra expense should be put upon him. To such as are weak in body as well as mind more than ordinary comforts should be given. To those who are lawfully within the walls, the fact of poverty should not subject them to any neglect or inhuman treatment. Their food and beds should be wholesome and comfortable and as a matter of fact are better than the food and beds of one-half of the people of Pennsylvania. They cannot ask more. The safe and sane rule for all is that the treatment and care of the insane should be such that the law be administered fairly (as a Judge would administer it) to both, the unfortunates and the people who must pay the bill; and as to paupers, the treatment they receive should be what they deserve according to the degree to which they helped to make themselves burdens and wards upon the good people of Pennsylvania.

The address of Mr. Eshleman was received with hearty applause, following which the convention, after the enrollment of delegates, adjourned until 2 o'clock.

ENROLLMENT OF DELEGATES.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention was called to order by President Wilson at 2 o'clock p. m. as per adjournment.

Mr. L. C. Colborn announced the following committees:

COMMITTEE ON PLACE OF NEXT MEETING—Mr. Bowditch, Germantown; Mr. Marshall, Indiana; Dr. Payne, Scranton; Mr. Dixon, Westmoreland; Mr. Gaertner, Luzerne; Mr. Smith, Erie; Mr. Snyder, Philadelphia.

AUDITING—Mr. Osche, Allegheny; Mr. Buchanan, Washington; Mr. Gray, Cambria.

OFFICERS—Mr. Fred Fuller, Scranton; Mrs. Lydia B. Walton, Chester; Mr. Boyd, Lancaster; Mr. Smith, Crawford; Mr. Bohler, Philadelphia; Mr. Lehman, Franklin; Mrs. Frampton, Clarion.

RESOLUTIONS—Mr. Gourd, Erie; Mr. Culp, Williamsport; Mr. Smith, Chester; Dr. Somer, Blair; Mr. Makin, Luzerne; Dr. Srodes, Allegheny; Mrs. Bowie, Fayette; G. W. Chapman, Greene.

Prof. Charles Lose, A. M., City Superintendent of Schools of Williamsport, was here introduced to the convention by the President, and said:

I feel somewhat diffident about appearing before you who are trained in this work, but it seems to me that the public schools ought to be represented in every public movement, and I felt it my duty to come here and say a few words to you.

I was asked to make a "little" talk. In that respect I can probably meet the requirements.

Prof. Lose here read a paper entitled, "Our Public Schools as a Means of Relief from Pauperism."

ADDRESS OF PROF. LOSE.

Our Public Schools as a Means of Relief from Pauperism.

The public schools cannot cure pauperism, but they may assist to a limited degree in preventing it.

The aim of the old-time school was classical scholarship and culture; the aim of the modern public school is knowledge and efficiency. To every pupil studying Greek to-day in the schools there are ten studying English, mechanical drawing, and chemistry. Education in the past was for the few, at the present time it is for all.

With the change in the conception of the purpose of the school has come a decided change in the character of the work. While the three R's are taught better and more thoroughly than ever before there have come into the schools such subjects as drawing, construction work, manual training, domestic science and domestic art, school and home gardening, and technical courses and commercial courses of great variety. All of this work has had a tendency to make boys and girls more efficient in the work of the world, to give them a respect for manual labor, to improve their home conditions, and to fit them for their environment.

Then again, the modern public school system through its evening schools and its continuation schools cares for those people whose education was stopped at an early age, and through its school savings bank it teaches habits of thrift at a time when the formation of such habits is most important, and most influential.

All of this work has its influence in the lives of the children in the poor homes as well as in the lives of the children of the well-to-do. In fact, the only lessons that some children ever get in sustained effort, work well accomplished, and proper habits they get in the public schools of the land. The public schools are the only agency under the sun that could take the children of the foreigners daily thronging our shores and turn these children into loyal and efficient American citizens.

Few persons realize the great equipment possessed by the modern public school system to help prosecute all movements for social progress. While the public schools now and always must consider the education of boys and girls as their principal work and must guard against the faddist who would waste the time of the schools with poorly-digested plans for reform, yet there is no step taken for the advancement of any class of society in which the public schools are not interested and are not able to give assistance. This is particularly true of movements intended to reach the poor and unfortunate. The compulsory schools drive every boy and girl between six and fourteen under the roof of the schools and into the hands of wise and sympathetic teachers, and the factory law gives the school authorities considerable supervision over the employment of every boy and girl between fourteen and sixteen. The school attendance officers inspect at frequent intervals every home where want and improvidence are common. Members of Parents' and Teachers' Clubs visit these homes and furnish relief in a way that does the most good and the least harm. The school physician and the school nurse preserve the health of the children of these families. Intelligent and kind-hearted teachers watch over these children with much more interest and care than are given to the ordinary child. School boards may establish schools for defectives, and parental schools for incorrigibles and may organize free lecture courses that bring into the lives of those unable to afford such things that which will make them wiser, happier, and better. The public school system is the most powerful machine possessed by a democracy to raise the people of its lower classes up to a level of comfort and efficiency.

Can any group of persons organized for charitable or civic or moral purposes afford to overlook the assistance they may get from the public schools, whose work and influence reach every home, whose ample funds are freely granted by a generous public and a wealthy State, and whose machinery is so all-powerful for good? I am fully convinced that while there may be no panacea for pauperism the public schools furnish one means by which boys and girls of pauper parentage may possibly be made into self-supporting men and women.

Prof. Lose supplemented the reading of the paper with the following remarks:

In the common branches of the schools they never have done as thorough work as they are doing now. Three times each year I examine about 4,000 papers that come to me, that are first copies, and among them hundreds of papers on which there is not a single misspelled word. That could not have been done with the old-time teaching of spelling. When I went to school it wasn't uncommon for a boy to be two years learning to read. In this day our teachers wouldn't be considered competent if they didn't start a boy to reading in ten weeks.

The pupils of our schools in Williamsport buy each year nearly 20,000 packages of seeds. Many poor children buy them. They are sold at one cent a package. Think of what that does for families that otherwise would have nothing along this line.

Take manual training. That is practical work, but in spite of that the boys do not neglect other departments.

On the question of domestic science; some years ago I visited the West and looked into that question. A little girl came up to me one day and showed me a pan of muffins. I inquired what that kind of work did in the home of these children. I was told that in many cases it had changed the character of the homes, entirely. That their food was better cooked and that they had better food.

Some people think we are dragging these matters into the schools and neglecting the other matters. That is not true. We are conducting, to-day, in Williamsport, six or seven evening classes, and in these we have a good many young men and women. We conduct what we call an intermediate class; we are teaching the multiplication table to some of that class and others we are teaching to read. We have a class of sixty or seventy who are going on in their mathematics, history, etc., and we have a class in typewriting and stenography.

The public schools take the children of foreigners and turn them into American children, and no one can do that but the public schools.

I just wrote the thirty-fifth employment certificate that has been issued in Williamsport. We don't have many institutions that employ boys and girls. I always ask, "What work are you going at" and "is it necessary for you to leave the public schools?" and I sometimes send the teacher to the parent to ask if it is not possible to keep the child in school longer.

I think the day is passed when the school teacher is partial to the well-dressed and well-behaved child. I think the teacher knows it is her business to care most for the unfortunate child. A city in the central part of the State has established, outside of the city, a country home, and in connection with the Poor Board I think, and have taken out of the schools children whose homes were unfit for them because of poverty and have placed them in this country home and will support them there and start them in life. Under our school laws now that is possible for any board.

The public schools have unlimited funds, and the public are back of them. Our high schools are very effidient.

Now it is possible there is not a word of what I have said that is of practical value. But it seems to me it is possible for you who are interested in looking after the poor to let us who belong to the public schools join with you in working out some of your problems.

Applause.

Mr. H. W. Osche, of Allegheny, here addressed the Convention as follows, on the subject, "After Many Years."

ADDRESS OF MR. OSCHE.

I don't know whether this means many years' experience as Director of the Poor or many years as a resident of Allegheny County, or many years as a married man. Nevertheless, I have one distinction in this association; this is the eighteen year I have attended here, and I don't know that there is another Director who has that distinction. In eighteen years, in a county like Allegheny, there is a good deal of work for a Director of the Poor. Many families huddle together; there are more causes for desertion, and for sickness and all that. I don't think there is a case of any kind that could be mentioned that I haven't had something to do with, from the foundling on the doorstep to the old grayhaired man and woman. I was taken with the remarks of Brother Eshleman, especially when he spoke of the increase of the feeble-minded in the institutions. Statistics show they have doubled, and we know that to-day people are too ready to have someone else take the burden off their shoulders. When I was a boy there were a couple of men we called crazy in our town, but the parents kept them at home; now the moment there is anything wrong the first place they go is to the Director of the Poor; the taxpayer must pay for their keeping. We have about 750 insane, and there are very few who contribute a dollar. And we have three or four hundred at Polk. In the last few years we have had many of the Hungarians and Slavs and Poles. They huddle together, and when they make any money they send it home; when they are in trouble they come to the Directors of the Poor. They never have any money. But I think the younger generation of that class will make good men and women; the boys and girls dress well, and the majority are honest.

There are a few suggestions I want to make to you. I think we should have an entirely new code of poor laws. I think that is one thing this association should do, to advocate that. I think every county should be a poor district of its own and should be governed by three men—I think three a better number than a larger number. We have three, and our county is one of the largest in the State.

There is another matter that causes trouble to us and that is the hydrophobia cases. Under the present law, anyone bitten by a dog and applies for aid the board is compelled to furnish them with treatment. In the last year we have had an average of eight or ten a month. It costs us $400 or $500 a month. Now, regardless of whether the party is poor or wealthy, I think anyone who desires to maintain a dog should be more or less responsible for the acts of that animal. The trouble occurs more with pet dogs and curs. A man who has a good hunting dog will take care of it. I can cite a case of a pet dog. A party came in and told us that the father and four of the children had been bitten by the dog; in the course of a month or so the man died of hydrophobia, and they brought the four children to us.

Another matter I might suggest. We will have an act to present to the Committee on Legislation; that is in regard to desertion. We should have a law making the desertion of a family a felony. We have a large number of cases of desertion, where a man will leave his family and go to another State, and there is no way to get him. You cannot arrest him unless you get him back into your own State. We have a case now where a man went to Minnesota, and he writes back to his wife that he will never return and that he is living there under an assumed name, and that he can have another wife and raise another family. But we cannot get him unless we can catch him in this State.

There is another matter, say where there is an old lady who has a little house and lot and no one to care for but hasn't enough means to live on and yet you cannot compel her to go to the County Home. Yet the neighbors will complain, and the difficulty is to get someone to go into court to make information. There should be a law that we could take a person of that kind, for their own betterment, and take them to the home. I make these suggestions that they may be taken up and discussed among you.

Applause.

ADDRESS OF MR. LOESEL.

Mr. Charles F. Loesel, of Erie, here addressed the Convention as follows on the subject, "Right View of the First Request for Aid; Uses and Solicitation of Material Relief."

Mr. President, Ladies, and Gentlemen.

I am delighted to be with you to-day. I think you made a mistake in getting me here to make a speech. Being a new member as a Director of the Poor, you ought to have called on some of the older members. But I will do the best I can.

My idea is that a Director should be a good judge of human nature. There are many stories told to them; they almost pierce any heart, and the more questions you ask the less you will find out. Which reminds me of a story about a man going down the street and seeing a young man pulling corn, and he says, "You have a lot of work ahead of you." And the young man says, "Yes." And he says, "Your corn looks yellow." And the boy says, "That is the kind we planted." And he says, "I don't think you will get more than half a crop." And the boy says, "We are planting it on halves, anyway." And he says, "There ain't much difference between you and a fool." And the boy says, "Only a fence." (Laughter).

We generally inquire where they buy their groceries and who they rent from, and generally take the matter up with the grocer, over the 'phone, and call up the charitable institutions to find if they are on the list. It is a good thing to co-operate with all the charitable institutions.

We had a case. A watchman at our plant was making $12 or $14 a week and the Secretary called me up and asked if we had such a person working there. We told him we had, and he says, "His wife wants help; the children have to have shoes." I went and asked him why his wife wanted help and he says, "There is a little trouble between us; she is a Catholic and I am not; she wants the children to go to the Catholic school and I want them to go to the Protestant school."

A lot of these people want help simply because things aren't going right at home.

A great many parents will send their children to get an order for groceries. I think that is wrong; it simply educates the children to get things without working for them. I never thought it right to issue orders to children.

I think that is all I have to say, and I thank you for your attention.

A Delegate: I would like to ask the last speaker what his minimum and maximum relief is.

Mr. McAlister (Erie): $6.50 a month is the maximum; we have no minimum price. We always investigate thoroughly by going among their friends and neighbors, and by going to their groceryman and their doctor. As a rule we can tell pretty near what we ought to do. I have been on the board now nine years; three and a half years of that I have been in the office at Erie, and I have investigated pretty thoroughly all over the City of Erie, and I find they will all bear investigation. They will scarcely ever tell you the exact truth. I think we are not imposed upon very much.

Mr. Smith (Chester): We, in Chester County, take a different view as to outside relief from many of the counties. I don't think we have spent $500 in any one year in the last sixteen years for outside relief, and we have a county of 100,000 people. We believe that to help the average family who apply for relief is making paupers of them and their children. Unless it is a very good family and a very exceptional case, we withhold all relief. A family that will apply for relief from year to year you had better break up and put the children into homes. Most of the people who come to you seeking relief will refuse to go to the County Home and will tell you they can live without relief. We will aid an old man and his wife, or a widow, living with her daughter, possibly.

Charles Snyder (Philadelphia): I represent a district that gives outdoor relief, in Philadelphia, and I always make it a rule to go and visit the family and find out about it. We have a Ladies' Aid Society and Relief Association, and if you are not very careful these people will impose on you and go to both societies. I have been to places where they were living nicely, and when I told them I would send them to the almshouse they didn't want any relief. One day a woman came to my office and with her a neighbor woman who told me this woman had nothing to eat, and I gave her an order for a dollar's worth of stuff and she went out to the gate and sold that dollar order for twenty-five cents and went into the theater and sat there nearly all the afternoon. In some of our meetings it has been said that they say nothing about the Director who has just taken his position. I know that a man who has no knowledge of giving out poor relief is imposed upon and it takes some time to learn his duties as a Director.

Some years ago I advocated the whipping post for men who deserted their families. This Association appointed a committee to go to Delaware and look the matter up. The doctor of Blockley Almshouse and myself went there and we found that very few of them came back for a second dose. One dose cured them, and that would be the way here.

As to outdoor relief, our last statement shows, "For outdoor relief $7,607.23." Where does that money go to? Much of it goes to people who should not receive it. There shouldn't any outdoor relief be given except in extreme cases. It only makes them dependent. Our young men go to the cities and raise families and then many of them are thrown on the Directors of the Poor. We have got to offer more inducements to the young men to stay at home and work on the farms. The time is coming when this country will not raise enough to support the people. We have got to go back to the farms.

Applause.

Mr. Brownsmiller: I am from the County of Schuylkill. We have applications printed and send them to the Justices of the Peace and Aldermen. If a person wants outdoor relief he has to go before a Justice and fill out and answer some twenty-five or thirty questions—as to the number of children, their ages, and the cause of destitution, etc. In addition to that he has to have on that application the names of two property owners, to swear that the facts stated are true. Then we make inquiry as to the destitution and condition of the family, and in many cases we find that the Justice is delinquent in his duty and swears the man and then goes to these people and they put on their names. So we want to make these people responsible who swear these parties to these papers. We were allowed $20,000 last year and paid out some $21,000. Twelve years ago the outdoor relief of our county was $42,000. It was this way: The Directors expected from fifteen to twenty-five per cent from every storekeeper.

Desertion is a great question with us. The minimum we allow is fifty cents a week, and from that to $2.50. We pay no rent and no coal bills, and we have it printed on the order that the storekeeper must give nothing but provisions. Some will take nothing the first, second, or third week, and the fourth week will buy a blanket, and the storekeeper puts it down "Provisions." Graft is at the bottom of it. It is graft.

ADDRESS OF MRS. FRAMPTON.

Mrs. B. H. Frampton, of Clarion, was introduced at this point and read the following interesting paper, which received the hearty applause of the delegates:

One of the most vital questions yet unformulated is the problem of childhood. We talk of the dependent child, of the great child-labor problem, of our definciency in protective legislation and our National indifference to conditions of working children and its disastrous results. We talk of the child-in-the-home problem and the child-education problem. Millions are being spent for investigating the placing-out system and many other components of the great universal problem of childhood.

But to find genuine and profound understanding of this most important theme, we must go back 1,900 years to the Christ of Galilee.

He knew the child was the embodiment of the future of humanity. He advised each of his Disciples that they should be as a little child. "Whosoever shall offend one of these little ones, it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck and be cast into the sea." This sentence has rung through the subsequent centuries, and yet the American people are slow to grasp the duty they owe to the child.

The immensity of the subject, which divides itself into many subheads, causes us to lose sight of the future. We see the scientific research into the psychology of childhood—juvenile courts, legislation for children, societies for the prevention of cruelties to children, children's hospitals, children's charities, and many other forms of helpful activities —and we think, because we have performed a part, we have succeeded as a whole. It has been stated there is not a sociologist, nor a writer of the laws of nature, topics of current events, or public interest, who has yet recognized American childhood as a whole. Jane Adams, in her "Newer Ideals of Peace," says: "We have made public education our great concern in America, and perhaps the public school system is our most distinctive achievement; but there is a certain lack of consistency in the relation of the State to the child after he leaves the public school." At a great expense the State has provided school buildings and other equipment in which to prepare professional teachers. It has spared no pains to make the system complete, and yet, as rapidly as the children leave the schoolroom, the State seems to lose all interest and responsibility in their welfare and has, until recently, turned them over to the employer with no restrictions.

Protection of our youth should be one of the highest, if not the supreme concern of our government and this no one will gainsay, for in the youth lie the future possibilities of our Nation and its welfare. Education and society fail if there are children whose physical, moral, and mental needs and demands are inefficiently cared for. Because we have failed to recognize childhood as a whole, may partially account for the three classes of children coming under the jurisdiction of the Juvenile Court and known as delinquent, dependent and incorrigible. The Juvenile Court is the great product of legal evolution. This tribunal is not merely a separate place for trial, but a court combined with an organization of associated child-saving methods. Judge Lindsey considers the essentials of his court to be—the acts enabling him to deal freely with delinquent and dependent children and to hold parents or adult agents responsible for the offenses of their wards. The Judge does more than rule the proceedings, he sympathizes, explains, guides, and inspires. Of all delinquents coming before the Juvenile Court at Denver, Judge Lindsey, claims ninety-six per cent finally reformed. This, on the whole, is said to be the best record in the world.

The dependent or neglected child is the child who is destitute or abandoned and is dependent on the public without parental care or guardianship. The incorrigible child is that child who is charged as being unmanageable, which charge under the juvenile legislation of our State can only be preferred by the parent or guardian. Delinquent children are those who are charged with the violation of any law of this Commonwealth, or any city, borough, or townships ordinance. This classification is also made to include any child who has been before designated as an incorrigible. Hence it is with these three classes that the Probation Officer works and to accomplish the true result aimed at by the Legislature of our State it is important that the Probation Officer should be one who is willing to study the delinquent child with respect to age, sex, physical, mental, and moral environment, economic situation and, as well, the condition of the home, for while the Judge of the Court of Quarter Sessions, of which system our Juvenile Court is a part, in his merciful consideration for the welfare of the child and society is the final arbiter in each instance, yet the Probation Officer, to whom the child is committed or under whose supervision the child is placed, is in a great measure the one upon whom depends the accomplishment of the desired end. There is a sentiment favoring women as Probation Officers, and perhaps, woman with her natural mother instinct does have a keener insight into the nature and disposition of the young offender.

Many delinquents have been saved to become good citizens by the sympathetic, humane efforts of the Probation Officers. Splendid results have followed where the Probation Officer has co-operated with the Children's Aid Society, and, to my mind, results just as encouraging and splendid, if not more so, would be obtained if in each instance of a dependent or neglected child being brought before our Juvenile Courts, the Court in the order of commitment would award such child to that society. The care of that class of children differs widely from that required for the children of the other two classifications, and, it is just such care that is provided by that society, and indeed, would not the care required for the children of the other classes be ample to busy the Probation Officer? The plea of the Children's Aid Society to the Juvenile Court should be—Award to us the dependent and neglected child!—and why should not the Court so order?

Judge Lindsey recommends that a course be provided by some school or schools for the training of those who deal with delinquents and with dependents. The Children's Aid Society of Western Pennsylvania has quite a number of trained volunteer workers; some have been training for twenty-five years and are truly seniors in the school of real experience and some have finished their course and been called to their reward, and as we look backward and recall that they have given the best efforts of their lives to this Christ-like cause, we are reminded of these beautiful words of Bailey: "We live in deeds, not years; in thoughts, not breaths. We should count time by the heart throbs, not figures on a dial. He lives most who thinks most, who feels noblest, acts best." The Children's Aid Society of Clarion County has done a splendid work in caring for dependent and neglected children, many of whom had it been otherwise would have been paupers, and perhaps, criminals. Let me tell you the story of a neglected child. * * *

You understand that we not only care for the destitute and neglected child, but I might add, the lame, halt, and blind. We make no distinction as to race, creed, or color. We place the child in a suitable boarding home in charge of some good motherly woman until a permanent home can be secured. You remember the keynote of the White House Convention?—"Home is the highest product of civilization." Children should not be deprived of it except for urgent and compelling reasons. Surely poverty alone should not disrupt the home. The widowed or deserted mother who is willing to work and to do her best, ordinarily should be helped in such a way as to enable her to bring her children up in the natural way. If it were possible to place a good mother in every home the results for good would be marvelous.

It has been said that the chief cause of delinquency is the non or semi-functionary home. Dr. Travis gives a number of causes for delinquency and they spring from every department of life—physical, economic, dispositional, physiological, individual, and the last and great cause as the family cause or the non or semi-functionary home. Our consideration will cover only the latter.

In the well organized home we usually find healthy parents, healthy children and such physical, mental, and ethical surroundings as constitute a wholesome home. The children of such a home are recognized practically as greater than any material thing thereto. In the other class of homes the parents may be so impoverished or ignorant as to sacrifice his child for wages or food. With the twentieth century and its world-wide expression of the industrial expansion of woman, she presents a new industrial, social, and legislative problem as to her place in organized industry. The employment of married women is rapidly on the increase, and it is asserted that it is not because they need to work at wage-earning, but because they prefer it to housekeeping. Medical authorities of Great Britain say that any attempt to combine the offices of child-bearer and bread-winner in one person must of necessity result in feeble babies and premature births. The damage cannot be measured by mortality figures for these take no account of the impaired vitality of the infants who manage to survive only to swell the ranks of degenerates and delinquents. One of the greatest evils associated with the employment of married women in industry is neglect of the children and the home. We also have lower wages and the unemployment of men, no one of which evils do women escape by their occupation in industry and yet in increasing numbers women abandon the home for wage-earning. In France the Council of Salubrity determines the branches of industry in which a woman may engage without detriment to her health. The economic reason for this is that the reproductive organs in particular are injured by the heavy strain of man's work and the human race degenerates in consequence of woman's impaired physical condition and ability to perform the maternal functions. My sympathy goes out to the army of women who are wage-earners because necessity demands it and in many cases are securing only starvation wages, perhaps their only resource is scrubbing or washing. Sordid wealth and cruel corporations have nothing to do with the individual save as a contributor to wealth, demanding the greatest production at the least cost, putting the dollar above the human being. The condition of society to-day makes one wonder if the old way was not the best when the women stayed at home, cared for the children, and were the housekeepers while the men labored in the ways of the world.

Let us now consider, briefly, the treatment of the junvenile delinquent. The history of juvenile delinqency has been divided into two periods, ancient and modern. Time will not permit me to mention the treatment of the delinquent during the former period. In the latter or modern period, since the law clearly distinguishes between the juvenile and the adult, the aim of the treatment is not to punish, but to reform. The treatment is framed to fit the offender, not the offense. Great changes for good have been the result of this experience, not of sentimentality. Why then are not the new methods more widely used? Mr. Flexner says: "I believe that every part of the law that involves a criminal conception of it should be eliminated. I would strike from the law all that relates to a jury trial; I would not leave a vestige to be pointed out by the advocates of the older methods as an evidence of adherence still to criminal procedure. I would write more clearly into these laws than has yet been done the benevolent principle that the proceeding involving the child is not criminal and that the child furthermore is not to be treated as a criminal."

It has been advocated that a remedy can be found in the schoolroom in a curriculum practical and human and that gives to the school a chance to affiliate itself with life and all those larger social activities which aim to catch the spirit of youth and lead it along normal lines by providing sane, healthful acitivities for energies that will be spent.

But I fear I have thrown no new light upon this great problem nor advanced any new thought for consideration. But some day let us hope that this struggling old world will have arrived at the truest conception of its duties to the neglected and the wayward child, and the exhausted, tired charity worker and philanthropist these beautiful words of Kipling will then soothe to rest:

When earth's last picture is painted, and
The tubes all twisted and dried;
When the oldest color has faded and
The youngest critic has died,
We shall rest, and faith, we shall need it,
Lie down for an aeon or two,
Till the Master of all good workmen shall Set us to work anew.

And those that were good shall be happy;
They shall sit in a golden chair;
They shall splash at a ten-league canvas
With brushes of comet's hair;
They shall find real Saints to draw from—
Magdalene, Peter, and Paul;
They shall work for an age at a sitting
And never grow weary at all!

And only the Master shall praise us,
And only the Master shall blame;
And no one shall work for money,
And no one shall work for fame;
But each for the joy of the working,
And each in his separate star,
Shall draw the thing as he sees it, for
The God of things as they are!

At the conclusion of the interesting paper of Mrs. Frampton, Mr. Colborn said: Mrs. Adelaide Comfort, of West Chester, has a matter to present to the Association and I move that the time be given to her now to present that matter to the Association.

Mrs. Comfort was received with applause and read a very interesting paper entitled, "A Plea for the Custodial Care of the Girl Who Is Known as a Bad Girl, but Is a Moral Imbecile," which was received most heartily by the members of the convention.

ADDRESS OF MRS. COMFORT.

Adelaide B. Comfort was appointed by the Chester County Children's Aid Society to prepare the following paper:

A Plea for Custodial Care of What Is Known as the Bad Girl, but Is a Moral Imbecile."

Plato, who for twenty years drank from the fountain of knowledge of his master, Socrates, said that the State should have absolute control over every citizen. The weak and unpromising children should be killed and many of the frail Spartan children were abandoned to the wild beasts of the mountains. Only the healthy babes were left to have harmoniously united the beauty of mind and body. Great care was taken so that nothing mean or vile would be shown to children. Their environments were to be beautiful and enobling, though simple.

The pagan ideas were undoubtedly along the right line to perpetuate only the best and strongest in the human race, but Paul commanded the Romans that were strong to bear the infirmities of the weak. Christianity recognizes the responsibility of each individual and enforces the law of brotherly love. The weak that will claim our attion for the present is that large class of women and girls who pass in and out of our charitable institutions, ayslums, reformatories, and prisons and who in their intervals of freedom are a source of misery to themselves and relatives and a menace to the community—incomplete in some mental or physical particular, so that it is impossible for her to live and make a constructive contribution to society; the class to whose existence society has been blind until its magnitude makes it impossible to longer refuse to see that which is insidiously sapping its foundation; the class which is recognized by those dealing with defectives and should have custodial care during child bearing age, so as to prevent the propagation of persons of more marked idiotic conditions, to be a source of heavier taxation to the normal child and the burden bearers of the future. In considering what the State should do to rid the community of this source of evil, I have visited institutions caring for the imbecile, epileptic, and criminal—to learn if it were possible to add a building to the already organized institution for the care of these moral degenerates.

The following are the opinions gathered from those most conversant with the subject:

Dr. H. H. Goddard, of New Jersey Training School, thinks the morally defective girl should be cared for in an institution for the class.

Dr. H. M. Cary thinks it not right to classify the moral imbecile with the poor unfortunate individual who merely lacks the development of the mental faculties. It is certainly no more right and proper to do this than to keep criminally insane in the same institution with the insane who have not been condemned as criminals.

Dr. Martin W. Barr writes that "Undoubtedly there should be an institution for the moral imbecile—an institution for the feeble-minded is not a place for them."

With Mrs. Martha P. Falconer twenty-five per cent are girls who should have custodial care past the child-bearing age. A reformatory where the methods employed are for normal individuals should not be burdened with these moral degenerates. The latter need a custodial institution adapted to their particular condition, taught as much as she is capable of learning, kindly treated and, as Dr. Srodes says, made happy and useful and to a large degree self-supporting.

Dr. H. H. Hart's belief is that such children should be segregated and should not be dealt with as responsible beings.

Doctors William Evans and Edwin H. VanDeusen, of Philadelphia, find a large percentage of the morally weak girls to be mentally deficient—one gives ninety per cent.

Dr. Katharine Bement Davis, of the Reformatory for Women, Bedford, N. Y., has more than twenty per cent girls who are so lacking in moral sense as to need permanent custodial care.

Dr. Alexander Johnson, Secretary of National Conference of Charities and Corrections, thinks there is no class in the community who so sorely need the permanent protecting care of the mother State as feeble-minded women and girls, and there is no class for whom it would be as good economy for the State to care for them.

Dr. Murdock writes: "I believe a seprate institution for this class of women is desirable."

With Mrs. F. A. Morton, Reformatory Prison for Women in Massachusetts, twenty per cent of the women under her care are defective. That these women and girls of inferior mental fiber should be gathered and forever have the doors closed behind them is the concensus of opinion of the Judges of our courts with whom I have communicated.

Dr. Jane Baker, of Chester County, says: "I believe that these girls should not be cared for at the poorhouses through the State, where their condition and its significance to the common weil is rarely grasped—also because the discipline they require should not be and is not required for the large majority of a poor house. In my experience of fourteen years in poor house living eighty-five per cent of the births there are of imbecile mothers."

Dr. Amos W. Butler, Indianauolis, Ind., asks why not stop the birth of such children? Why should not feeble-minded women of child-bearing age be secluded? They are now largely cared for at public expense in almshouses and by other agencies. If they could be segregated in institutions the reproduction of their kind would be cut off and at the same time they could earn a part of their support—many of these women are mothers of from three to six feeble-minded children. Five women of this class not specially selected are known to be the mothers of nineteen children. Fifteen of the children have been inmates of public institutions and the records show that up to the present time they have spent a total of 136 years therein, at an average annual maintenance expense of $100. These children have cost the State $13,600, and seven of them still remain public charges.

From Dr. W. E. Fernald, Massachusetts School for Feeble-Minded, Waltham, we have the following: "The tendency to lead dissolute lives is especially noticeable in feeble-minded females; a feeble-minded girl is exposed as no other girl is exposed. She has not sense enough to protect herself from the perils to which women are subjected. Often bright and attractive, if at large, they either marry and bring forth in geomerical ratio a new generation of defectives and dependents or become irresponsible sources of corruption and debauchery in the communities where they live. There is hardly a poorhouse in this land where there are not two or more feeble-minded women with from one to four illegitimate children each. There is every reason in morality, humanity, and public policy that these feeble-minded women should be under permanent and watchful guardianship, especially during the child-bearing age. A feeble-minded girl of the higher grade was accepted as a pupil at the Massachusetts School for Feeble-minded when she was fifteen years of age. At the last moment the mother refused to send her to the school as she could not bear the disgrace of publicly admitting that she had a feeble-minded child. Ten years later the girl was committed to the institution by the Court after she had given birth to six illegitimate children, four of whom were still living and all of whom were feeble-minded. The city where she lived had supported her at the almshouse for a period of several months at each confinement, had been compelled to assume the burden of the lifelong support of her progeny, and finally decided to place her in permanent custody. Her mother had died broken-hearted several years previously."

The above instance is one which could be duplicated from our records with all sorts of complications and variations and they all illustrate the following points: First, that nothing is so costly to the community as the inefficient or neglectful handling of such a case, and second, that if the condition of the woman at the first commitment has been properly recognized she would have been segregated for life or at least until such time as she was no longer of the child-bearing age.

Economists realize the question of providing properly for the defective is one of the great financial problems of modern times.

Dr. Joseph F. Neff, Director of Public Charities of Philadelphia, says: "Appeal to the pocketbook of the taxpayer and show that it would be economical for State or city to provide for all feeble-minded women and girls during child-bearing age," and Ellis Ames Ballard says: "If thousands of dollars are not spent now, soon millions will be needed for the same purpose."

As a simple business proposition no State can make a better investment or one actually paying larger dividends than to insure that the feeble-minded women of child-bearing age are prevented from bringing defective paupers into the world, to go on reproducing themselves. The direct money saving from this result alone would in a few generations represent a sum equal to the cost of maintenance of the entire feeble-minded population of the State.

It is claimed that the establishment of a custodial department for feeble-minded women of child-bearing age in Indiana has in the last ten years materially decreased the birth rate of illegitimates.

The reports of such institutions as that at Newark, N. J., designed exclusively for women, are extremely interesting and deal with this phase of the question:

"The objects and purposes of the Custodial Asylum are exclusively for the enforced custody and protection during the child-bearing age of feeble-minded women of such physical development as to be capable of becoming mothers, who are indigent residents of the State. The institution is supported by the State, except transportation and funeral expenses, in event of death, which must be born by the county whence they come. It is not a school in an educational sense, but constructed as a well-regulated home, with special regard to training in all household duties and industries, the cultivation of habits of cleanliness, propriety, physical culture, music, vocalization, and self-reliance. A school department is maintained for such as are teachable and of school age."

The State has met the question of personal liberty and has decided against it in the interest of public health in compulsory education. We are compelled to take care of the insane. Children who break the law are taken from their parents. Nowhere in this world of law can there be personal liberty to do wrong without punishment. The only real liberty that can exist under the reign of law, is the freedom to choose among the various ways of doing right. The peace of society and the rights and liberty of all must be regarded.

Society certainly has the right to control the propagation of human beings with the hereditary criminal and with one who is of the abnormal physical type.

At the alumni of Bellevue Hospital last spring one advocate of this right stated he believed that in four generations it would wipe out nine-tenths of crime, insanity, and illness. Confucius said, "To see that which is right and not do it is want of courage."

In closing I would urge upon every one here that, whatever the conditions are, these girls are either a private or a public burden and one that, if not wisely considered, will place upon our children a greater burden than the making of bricks without straw was to the Israelites, and that we of to-day should make every effort to produce a public sentiment that will segregate these girls during the child-bearing age at least. It should be a State care with local aid as is now done with the insane—i. e., the county paying its proportionate share of the maintenance. I would also urge you to consider the importance of Dr. Samuel G. Dixon's work of recognizing the importance of attending to the defective school child. By the age of eight to nine years, these should receive special care and by so doing evil tendencies can be kept in control.

Emerson tells us the way to mend the bad world is to create the right world. Is there—

Nothing to do in this land of ours
Where weeds spring up with the fairest flowers,
Where sunshine has ever a fitful play,
Where hearts are breaking every day.
Lord send Thy help the journey through Lest faint we cry, "So much to do."

Mr. Colborn: That is a fine paper, and this subject interests every county in the State. In a visit to Dr. Barr a few years ago he said to me: "Mr. Colborn, I have been investigating a single case in your county. Do you know how many insane and feeble-minded persons come from those two families in Somerset County? There are eighty insane and feeble-minded in those two families, and they are on the increase."

I asked the Doctor what was the prevention of that, and he answered: "Segregation of the females and castration of the males."

These are the things we must confront, and we ought to go at it in a way that will accomplish the result; throw away our modesty in these things. I was very much pleased at the ladies, in their papers, naming right out the evils that are brought on and which the people have to contend with from these questions. I think the Committee on Resolutions ought to suggest that a building be provided for by the State as custodian of feeble-minded girls until they are past the child-bearing age. Mrs. Williard this summer helped us out in a case of that kind. We were at a loss where to put the girl and Mrs. Williard came to the rescue and this girl is now provided for.

Mr. Smith (Chester): This is a very important question. It affects the moral standing of each and every community. I hope when you go home you will try to create a sentiment to have a law passed for an institution for the morally and mentally-deficient girls. There is no law by which we can control these girls. We have fifteen or twenty girls of that class that we are holding, contrary to law, and I know we have saved the reproduction of more than a hundred children from girls of that class in the last fifteen years. Let us establish an institution that can uplift and care for these girls, as our almshouses cannot do. We are not prepared in the almshouses to separate them. They should not be allowed in the almshouses. By building a place for their care, and establishing some light labor, like the manufacture of hosiery, etc., I think the class of morally-deficient will be materially reduced in the next few years.

Mr. Brownsmiller: I desire to say this: These papers show that we live in times of physical tests, microscopical tests, and X-ray studies. I want to thank these ladies who have read these papers and those who have given talks on this matter from the bottom of my heart. I am only one from Schuylkill County. When I asked for money to found such an institution they laughed at me. Let us do all we can to eliminate this great evil.

Applause.

Mr. G. W. Chapman: I think that each county in the State ought to have the same laws in relation to the poor. If there is anyone in the State that ought to be honored I think it is a Director of the Poor, because the responsibility is great. If a man hasn't the sympathy of heart to protect the poor he isn't fit for a Poor Director. I would suggest that there be a law passed to make each county alike under the law. And allow each Poor Director, if he wants to take his wife along with him, let the county foot it ;and they ought to have the attorney go along. I venture to say that nine-tenths of the people don't know how the other one-tenth live. Go into some homes and if it don't try the heart of any man I will give up. I am not a sportsman, but I do keep dogs; my dogs lie in a more creditable place than some of these children when they lie down at night.

Dr. A. J. Somer, Jr., Superintendent of the Blair County Hospital, here read the following paper, "An Ideal Hospital for the Insane," which was received with applause:

ADDRESS OF DR. SOMER.

An Ideal Hospital for the Insane.

My subject is one of interest to all—to many of us it is one of very peculiar interest. I beg your indulgence for a few minutes and I will do my best to offer you some suggestions, the result of many years' close association with the mentally afflicted, and indicate some of the practical conclusions at which I have arrived.

The care of the insane involves two chief purposes—one is their safe detention so that they may do no harm to themselves or to others, and the other is that of their curative or palliative treatment. In times gone by public authorities were quite content to provide a house of detention—I might say a prison—for the insane and if that house had a watertight roof and sufficient food was provided to support life that was considered to be amply sufficient provision for such unfortunates. Public opinion then fully approved, and the lot of the insane was very little ameliorated. We have now advanced and it is recognized that the insane have rights and that the community has corresponding duties. Public opinion no longer tolerates the detention of the insane as prisoners—the dictates of humanity no longer approve of the insane having no care or attention but that accorded by jailors who by callous association become more or less brutal to their helpless charges. The mentally afflicted are no longer thrown promiscuously together and permitted to add to one another's tortures, but society has recognized its duty to make some sacrifice in order to afford therapeutic treatment to these unfortunate people and to secure, as far as practicable, that they shall have fair chances of recovery and consequent restoration to the ranks of self-supporting and useful members of society. An asylum for the insane that has only the features of a prison will not much longer be tolerated by any self-respecting community. We now have hospitals for the insane and such hospitals must be provided with conveniences and appliances for the curative or palliative treatment of the inmates, as well as their safe detention under conditions which will make their lot as tolerable as possible. A building merely sufficient to afford safe and even comfortable detention would be a very inadequate provision if the cure and alleviation of its inmates is looked upon as of paramount importance. It will probably occur to most of you that it is impracticable to dispense with barred windows and locked doors and those who feel sorry for the afflicted will wish to make such ameliorative changes in or additions to their environment as will, in some degree, modify their surroundings which, under the most favorable circumstances, can never compare favorably with their own home—"Be it ever so humble there's no place like home." I am fully aware that I am speaking of public institutions which are supported by the taxpayers and in connection with which the necessity of strict economy is of paramount importance so that the financial burden of their support shall press as lightly as possible on those who must pay for the misfortunes of their friends and neighbors. In the course of my experience I have learned that the best and strictest economy is entirely consonant both with the best interests of the insane as well as with the interests of those who have to bear the burden of their support. The address of the Hon. Mr. Eshleman this morning suggested important considerations on this subject and you will find that I am almost entirely at one with him. I hope to win your acquiescence to the statement that an "Ideal Hospital for the Insane" is the only provision that can be made for the mentally afflicted that is truly economical from the strictest financial point of view, the highest and best from the social or political point of view, and the only proper way of discharging our duty to our unfortunate neighbors.

It is well know that a fair percentage of those who suffer from acute mental trouble are curable. In every alienist's experience there are many cases that promise a satisfactory result if subjected to proper and satisfactory treatment, while the same cases offer no satisfactory prognosis in the absence of such opportunities and means of treatment. Therefore, the question is, "What kind of a house is propertly adapted, both for the safe detention and satisfactory treatment of insane persons?" And, "Is the provisions of such a house consonant with the interest of the taxpayers who have to bear the burden of the cost of its construction and maintenance?" On this latter point I again reassure you and emphatically state my conviction that real economy is best secured by providing buildings of an entirely suitable character.

Without entering into a disquistion of the details of the medical treatment of the insane, I remind you of the kind of trouble or disease we are combating. It is a mental trouble. These mental cases require such ameliorations of their environment and treatment as are proper to soothe and satisfy diseased and troubled minds. One of the best, if not the best, means at our disposal is to place the patient in rural surroundings with attractive and interesting scenery. It is obvious that the country is the best place to secure cheap sites for buildings and that land for cultural purposes is there available at prices far less than close to our cities and towns. My "Ideal Hospital" should be built in a commanding position, preferably on a hill, with extensive views of the surrounding country on all sides. Trees, foliage, and flowers should surround the buildings in picturesque array but the trees should not be so many or so close or so thick as to unduly diminish the views of the distance. The site should, if possible, be chosen so that the surrounding grounds are fertile and the extent of the hospital grounds should be planed on a basis of two acres per head of the anticipated population. Of ward buildings there should be at least four, so that the different classes of cases may be separated—it is wrong, it is false economy, to keep the noisy and filthy with the quiet, the decent and the convalescent. The wards should be large and airy, well lighted, and well heated. There should be besides the domitories, rooms for private and disturbed cases, sitting rooms, rooms for games, and sun parlors. A large kitchen with modern equipment for steam and fire cooking is a practical and economical necessity. The dining rooms should be as light and cheerful as possible. A chapel and amusement hall is really indispensable and a moving picture and stereoptican apparatus should undoubtedly be provided.

The medical department should receive careful attention and be fitted as completely as the exigencies of the particular hospital require. An outfit for hydro and electro therapeutics ought to be provided in every hospital for the insane. A small, well appointed operating room, a drug shop and laboratory will make this department sufficiently complete.

The offices should be designed to afford proper accommodation for the staff that will be required to carry on the administrative work therein. It must be remembered that many visitors come and go in such an institution and that State and county officials, as well as the relations and friends of the patients have to be accommodated when they are received at the hospital on various matters of business? It is not uncommon for visitors to arrive in groups and scanty accommodation is a great inconvenience and drawback and may easily be a cause of loss of revenue from private patients whose friends imbibe unfavorable impressions. That which will facilitate the dispatch of business and make for efficiency will be equally important as assisting in the economical administration of such institutions.

As to the accommodation to be provided for the Superintendent and his family, the nurses, attendants, and other employees, I will just say a word. When it is borne in mind that their lives are passed in ministering to the wants of the mentally afflicted and their work is, in its very nature, if not actually, of a depressing character and intimately associated with sad circumstances, it will be appreciated that they are entitled to sympathetic consideration. The private quarters of the Superintendent should be liberally designed and nicely furnished. The other employees are equally entitled to consideration and it would generally be well to provide their quarters in a separate building. Such institutions will generally be situated far from the usual opportunities of recreation and amusement and all the employees should have such accommodation as will afford them a place of pleasant retreat and mental relief after their day's work among the mentally sick.

Outbuildings consisting of a laundry, stables, barns, powerhouse, etc., will be required according to the extent of the work carried on by the hospital. I will not say much about these. The laundry requires very serious consideration in the interest of the patients and therefore in the interest of the economical administration of the hospital. The patients will be required to do practically all the work of the institution and the laundry should be constructed so as to secure good ventilation and health conditions so that those who work therein may not become ill and an additional burden on the establishment. In many laundries the ceilings are low, and the washing machines, dryers, and ironing boards are all arranged in one room. Such a state of things makes it unhealthy for the workers, besides being so uncomfortable as to interfere with the efficiency of the workers, and is, therefore, not conducive to economical working. The laundry department should occupy a separate building where the various phases of work can be so arranged that the health and comfort of the patients who work therein is reasonably provided for; this will be a great advantage to the workers, it will make for efficiency and will also be an advantage to the taxpayers who support the institution.

If practicable the site for such an "Ideal Hospital" as I am endeavoring to interest you in, should be chosen so as to have the great advantage of a natural and good supply of water without pumping. If to this can be added a stream of sufficient volume to supply power it will prove an immense advantage. I would mention Norristown and Rittersville as examples of places where costly artesian wells have had to be sunk from which every drop of water that is used has to be pumped by steam power up to reservoirs above the level at which the water is required to flow by gravity. Besides a large capital outlay this involves a great and never ending source of expense. This constant drain on the revenues of an institution is not like an initial expense, as for instance, the erection of a building, but a perpetual burden on the funds of the institution as well as a recurring cause of expenditure for repairs, etc., which, in the course of years, amounts to a very large sum. This is a very important consideration in the administration of a large public institution like a hospital for the insane. A stream of water affords a very cheap source of power and one that may be made available for a great variety of work.

For a moment I will invite your attention to a few details, which I consider of much importance. All dwellings should be efficiently screened from mosquitoes, flies, etc. Very urgently should a hospital for the insane be so screened. It will occur to all of you that the annoyance of the mosquito ought to be abated so that the mentally afflicted be not further distressed and that especially when the remedy is so easy. But there are other considerations; in a block of buildings where so many people live it is more than ordinarily necessary to take these precautions. People in an insane hospital are not the most healthy members of society and in a large institution illness is always present. It is an obvious and urgent danger that mosquitoes should have the opportunity of going from ward to ward and building to building biting first the sick and then the well and so possibly spreading disease not only from patient to patient in the institution, but from the hospital to outside dwellings and from outside dwellings to the hospital. For somewhat similar reasons every precaution should be taken to exclude that prevalent and filthy pest, the common house fly.

The plumbing of a hospital for the insane requires special attention. You will appreciate that we have to deal with people among whom we find some unfortunates that are extremely filthy in their habits and therefore extra provision is required. Then, it is necessary to remember that such articles as clothing, boots, sheets, etc., are commonly thrown by the irresponsible inmates into the various receptacles and such things have in my own experience frequently caused the flooding not only of the lower parts of the buildings, but sometimes the wards themselves with sewage. This is a matter of urgent importance, but is apt to be overlooked even by architects, unless they have had very especial experience in designing hospitals for the insane. The problem of draining a large hospital for the insane involves all the defficulties of draining general hospitals, almshouses, factories, etc., and its own peculiar difficulties as well.

The plastering of a hospital for the insane should, for strict economy's sake, be of cement plaster in all the apartments where the insane frequent. The damage done by these persons to ordinary plaster must be seen to be appreciated. I have seen an instance where a patient stripped the whole of the plaster from the walls of a room as high as he could reach. The ordinary soft mortar plaster is quite insufficient for the walls of rooms occupied by these destructive and irresponsible people and true economy requires that a constantly recurring expense for repairing damaged walls be avoided—even at the price of a greater first cost. Such repairs year after year soon total up far more than the first cost of a durable and indestructible cement plaster. Doors and other woodwork within the reach of the patients should be solid and strong or they will be damaged and ordinary doors will occasionally have their panels kicked out. The floors of the buildings should be of well seasoned maple, built over concrete, as that is a good sanitary flooring and it looks well. Much trouble and expense can be occasioned by want of a little knowledge or experience in several minor ways—e. g., I know a case where as many as eighteen different sizes of widow glass is to be found in various windows and the extra trouble and expense this occasions can be at once appreciated. Not one of these sizes is a standard size.

Another requirement for my ideal hospital is that its surroundings are satisfactory. The importance of this requirement can hardly be overrated. It is not uncommon to choose for the site of a hospital for the insane a position within a very short distance from the poorhouse. This is both uneconomical to the taxpayers and unfair to the inmates. Most of the inmates of our hospitals are there because of unmerited misfortunes and all of them because of causes now beyond their control. This cannot be said of all the inmates of poorhouses, most of whom are there through their own fault and shiftlessness and many of whom might, if they so choose, at once earn their own livelihood, but they prefer to live on the charity of others. It is, therefore, unfair to the inmates of hospitals for the insane and their relatives, friends and neighbors to compel them to live so close to the poorhouse. Further, it occasions a loss of revenue to the hospital. In a case within my personal knowledge several paying patients have preferred to go to hospitals a long away off rather than become inmates of a hospital that has for its very close neighbor a poorhouse. This is a very serious mistake, for paying patients are a valuable source of income and everything that is proper should, in the interest of the taxpayer, be done to attract them. It is to be borne in mind that a hospital for the insane, if properly equipped, has ready a completely organized staff to care for the insane and that the addition of a few extra inmates does not, except in a small degree, increase the expense, so that most of the fees received from such a source is pure profit. It is inexpedient from every point of view that a hospital for the insane be associated in any way with a poorhouse and such association never tends to economy.

Having thus far lightly indicated that the best interests of the inmates of a hospital for the insane are entirely at one with the best interests of the taxpayer, I now carry the point a step further. One of the most effective methods of treatment of the insane is to provide them with suitable and interesting occupations and of all occupations those connected with outdoor life are undoubtedly the best. This indicates the advisability, in the interests of the patients, of keeping such live stock as expediency may indicate as well as the cultivation of a farm and garden. I invite your attention for a moment to the favorable opportunities and conditions for such work. In the first place there is always a certain proportion among the inmates of such an institution of able-bodied and sufficiently intelligent men and women who are anxious to be so employed and whose condition is much ameliorated by such occupations. There is, therefore, ready and anxious for such employment, a considerable force of labor. Such labor of course, requires careful supervision, but this point is negligible, for the patients require to be constantly looked after and it is much better to superintend them in the satisfactory surroundings of the open country than in a workshop, and such a course is preferred by a majority of the patients. I have now shown you that sufficient labor is always available—not at a cheap rate, but actually without cost—and that that labor is anxious for such employment, and further that it will be of benefit to the inmates to be so employed and that most of them will prefer so to pass their time. This is an ideal state of things and it is strange, indeed, that it is not more frequently taken advantage of; but in many cases the directors of hospitals for the insane hesitate to incur the first cost of buying cows, pigs, poultry, and other stock and providing accommodation for them for fear of sustaining a loss. The risk of loss is small and the probability of a successful issue of any such enterprise, provided it is conducted with very moderate ability, far outweighs any risk of failure. All of the milk consumed at hospitals for the insane ought to be produced by their own stock and that at a cost very much less than the present cost of milk to the taxpayers. With regard to poultry and pigs the position is even stronger, for in large institutions there is always a quantity of food scraps which otherwise would be wasted and than which no better food can be found for such stock. There is every reason why such a number of fowls should be kept as would produce an ample supply of eggs for all the inhabitants of such an institution and pigs enough to make a very important addition to the meat supply. Considering that all this may be done with a very moderate first outlay and a trifling working expenditure, and that with a great benefit and much satisfaction to the inmates, I claim that I have again demonstrated that strict and real economy in the administration of such an institution is quite at one with actual benefit and personal likings of the inmates. A good vegetable garden ought to be looked upon as absolutely indispensable. Nearly every morsel of vegetable consumed in a large hospital for the insane ought to be grown by the patients themselves. Every one would benefit by such a course. The taxpayer would receive a direct benefit, for such vegetables would cost him but a trifle in excess of the cost of seed, and the patients would be benefited in two ways—first, by the liberal quantity of absolutely fresh and wholesome vegetables that would be served to them, and secondly, by the interesting occupation and health-giving exercise that their cultivation afforded them.

Time will not permit me to enlarge on the expediency of obtaining stock that is really good and first class. Ten good cows will produce as much milk as forty indifferent cows, but the ten good cows would in the first place cost as much or more than the forty indifferent ones, and that fact prevents the taxpayers' money being spent to the best advantage. The ten good cows would not cost more to keep than one-quarter of the cost of the forty indifferent cows and their calves would sell at high figures. Properly selected stock properly looked after should prove a great source of revenue and, if there was time, I should like to give you examples and figures. As it is, I must content myself by merely mentioning the example set by Chester County. The stock there is so good that the farmers buy eagerly all that can be produced and spared—to the great profit of the institution and the great advantage of the farmers.

Besides the occupations referred to there, should be a small cannery to preserve practically all the fruits and vegetables for use in winter; a mattress shop, a brush shop, a weaving room, and a sewing room would be economical.

As far as practicable all articles used and consumed in a hospital for the insane should be made or produced by their labor. This would often necessitate the employment of outside assistance, but the result would be that the cost of maintenance would be enormously reduced and the patients correspondingly benefited. If you are acquainted with what has been done by the hospitals for the insane in the State of Wisconsin you will know that I am not exaggerating the practical possibilities of the position in the least degree.

The diet of the insane is closely connected with the self-production of food that I am advocating. Consider the inestimable advantage to these unfortunate people of having a constant and liberal supply, of pleasing variety, of the foods that are the very best of their kinds. It is only to mention such a thing and you will all appreciate it.

One point that I especially desire to demonstrate I have kept for the last. I think that here it finds its logical place, for all that I have said naturally leads up to it. I desire to emphasize that a hospital for the insane should be conducted with the sole object of curing every case that it is possible to cure and of alleviating every case that it is possible to alleviate. Although, to cure a few extra cases that are on the border line between acute and chronic insanity, a considerable expenditure be incurred, such expenditure will be in the cold-blooded interests of strictest economy. The cost of a patient is about $150 a year. A chronic case may be expected to last about ten to twenty years. So a case of acute insanity that is cured, instead of being allowed to lapse into a chronic state, represents a very notable saving to the taxpayer. A few such cases every year would economically justify a very liberal expenditure. I think in no other condition of life does the highest duty to our neghbors, the insane, so completely agree with our own self-interest.

Ladies and gentlemen, I hope I have not wearied you and that I have given you facts which will win you over to my proposition—that a hospital for the insane can be conducted solely in the interests of the inmates and that when that is done the highest dictates of humanity, the best interests of the State and the pocket of the taxpayer will all be benefited thereby.

Mr. Colborn: On the question that was just up for discussion, a paper was just handed to me with the request that I read it.

Mr. Colborn here read the following paper by Mr. J. A. Gray, of Cambria County:

PAPER BY MR. GRAY.

The Development of the Almshouse.

Charity, like Christianity, had its origin in the East. Among the pimitive nations of the world alms giving was taught as a religious observance. Among the Euorpean nations of antiquity provision for the poor was adopted as a State policy. Ancient Athens could boast of having no citizen in want, "nor did any disgrace the nation by begging." But war soon brought poverty in its train and Athens decreed the maintenance of those who were maimed in battle and the children of those who were slain.

In Greece there were societies for the relief of distress and want. But we must remember that ancient Athens and Greece were slave-holding aristocracies, whose poor were broken-down slaves.

Ancient Rome passed laws to prevent extreme riches and extreme poverty. They took from those who had and gave to those who had not. At one time in Rome 200,000 citizens were fed free at the public crib. This resulted in two things—a nation of mendicants and caused the land to fall out of cultivation. The people concluded that if the government would feed the people free then no one need work.

In the Middle Ages the great body of the laboring class were only serfs and slaves and many who were free were forced by the miseries of want and poverty to go back into bondage as a refuge from starvation. Even in old England the poor laborers were attached to the soil and passed with the title to the land as chattels, like cattle.

Then came the Christian Church, and she constituted herself the great receiver and dispenser of alms.

In many of the European countries the church still holds, to a large extent, the position of public almoner. And surely if the Christian Church lived up to the faith which it teaches there would be little indeed remain to be done by the State.

Our American laws governing the care of the poor are framed after those of England and ours are the most humane poor laws in the whole world.

The barbarous system of farming out the poor of a district to the lowest bidder, which still lingers in some benighted spots of our land in this year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and ten, gave rise to the "poorhouse." The poorhouse is a development of the ideas of the people as to their duty to the unfortunate wrecks of human lives all around us, and in no department of human progress has the development been more rapid than in the treatment of our less fortunate brothers and sisters. The development has been onward and upward in the spirit of the Golden Rule.

From the starving or professional beggar at the roadside or church door, thence to the farming out of the unfortunate poor to the lowest bidder, we have come to the "poorhouse" and thence to the "county almshouse," and now to the better and more charitable name, "county home." Every county home should be big enough to accommodate every man, woman, or child who has any claims on humanity, in a comfortable manner, with such food, clothing, and surroundings as will make life a pleasure while it lasts, and be too small to admit of a single person not entitled to its privileges. The vagrant or loafer must be provided for elsewhere in some workhouse or criminal institution. He who will not work should not eat.

The ideal county home should be a model in every respect. The home, farm, work, management, and discipline should be as a light set on a hill, the pride of the taxpayers who sustain it. The home should be so constructed and managed that ideal sanitary conditions should be exemplified in every particular. Those who are physically unclean and unfit to mingle with mankind should be completely isolated. No inmate should be permitted to come in contact with any one who might communicate any disease. Tubercular, syphilitic, or others subject to any communicable disease should be kept absolutely separate from others and under the most healthful surroundings, and this demands separate departments, well managed, where the latest and most improved treatment can be carried out.

Every county home should have a separate department, entirely independent, for the care and treatment of the mentally defective and mildly insane, so that relatives and friends could keep in close touch with their unfortunate and render such aid and assistance as possible, and feel sure that they are receiving proper care. This would overcome the inhuman overcrowding of our State asylums where it is absolutely impossible to give proper attention to the inmates, and relieve counties of a large expense. The asylum or hospital for Blair County is just such an ideal establishment as I have in mind. I understand there are other counties in the State where the same conditions prevail. I have often thought that the herding of the idiotic, half crazy, and those suffering from unnamable diseases with the unfortunate poor, but respectable old people whose fortune and friends have gone, is a horror from which one might be tempted to be saved by the suicidal route.

The spirit in and about every county home, prompting every move, planning every building, managing and controlling every department, should be none other than the Golden Rule: "Do unto others as you would have others do unto you." This is the supreme law.

At the conclusion of the reading of this paper the Convention was adjourned until 7:45 this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

Pursuant to adjournment, the Convention was called to order at 7:45 p. m. by President Wilson.

Rev. Pyles, of the Pine-street Methodist Church, offered prayer, as follows:

Father in heaven, may we receive a blessing at Thy hands. We are here to try to devise ways and methods by which the needy and infirm shall be cared for and to provide for their manhood and womanhood. We recognize that in this work wisdom more than human is necessary. We recognize that many things that are done in the name of charity are anything but uplifting and inspiring. We desire to so minister to the needy that they shall be able to help themselves and to develop character and to become good citizens. We realize that our work must not only provide for the needs of the needy, but that it is our business to see that all agencies and factors in business that tend to make paupers and to throw them upon the State for support shall cease, and that in business life and in our social relations that the tendency shall be to uplift and to improve manhood and womanhood, rather than to make paupers.

To this end we pray Thy blessing upon this organization and Thy divine guidance in all they may do. We pray for Thy guidance and wisdom in everything that confronts those who toil for Thy kingdom, that Thy name shall be honored and that the things that interfere with the progress of Thy kingdom shall cease to be; that Thy will shall be done in earth as it is in heaven. We ask it for Jesus sake. Amen.

The same young ladies mentioned in the report of yesterday again favored the Convention with music.

Hon. Amos W. Butler, of Indianapolis, Secretary of the Board of State Charities of Indiana, was here introduced to the Convention by President Wilson. Mr. Butler was received with applause and addressed the Convention on the subject, "Charities of a Great State," as follows:

ADDRESS OF MR. BUTLER.

Mr. Chairman and Friends.

I suppose there are many people who would like to know how to live to a good old age. I will give you a prescription that was given to me several years ago. In visiting a county poor asylum I came across a woman who was quite attractive, although her hair was white, her face smooth and brown, and she interested me very much. I said, "How are things here?" She says, "Oh, they are very nice, thank you, sir; we old people like them very much." I said, "You are not old," and she replied "I am eighty-two years old." I said, "There is one thing I want to ask you; how is it you look so young and fresh?" "La," said she, "if you want to live a long while you just get on the county." (Laughter and applause).

I suppose that is the secret of it; absence from worry and trouble tend to long life. I found that she was one of three generations that had been objects of public charity. We find that many of the public charges run in families. I suppose most persons are very thoughtless about the class of persons who become public charges. How many of us think of the boy who is a deaf mute who goes away to school. Do we know how he is being cared for and trained? Do we give any thought to the woman in our community who is taken away to a hospital for the insane to be treated? Do we think of the treatment that is given her, and of the training and care that is necessary to her mental improvement? And then the man who is charged with an offense, and tried and convicted and sentenced. We may be standing on the station platform and see him, in company with the Sheriff, get on the train; and the last we see is the smoke of the train, as it starts away. Do we ever think what becomes of that man? Most persons give no thought to him.

It is for the purpose of directing your attention to the care of these public charges that I am to speak to you. Each branch of the government has to do with certain aspects of philanthropy. In the township or county we can care for the pauper, and in that work the county has its share. When we come to the question of the care of the blind, the treatment of the insane, and the custody of the felon the county can do little. The State must provide for these. When we come to the problem of immigration the Federal Government must take hold; so each of these has its share in the care of the great class in which we are concerned. The county poor asylum is the primary charitable institution. Out of it have come all the State charitable institutions, as swarms of bees from the hive. In some States there is provision made for the outdoor poor, by the township trustees or by the county authorities, and they determine whether they shall be cared for in their homes or in institutions. In some States the abuse of the administration of outdoor relief has been striking. In my own State the abuse became a great scandal. The Board of State Charities studied the subject, and in 1895 secured the passage of a law providing for State supervision of the township poor relief. The amount of such relief in 1895 amounted to more than $630,000. The Legislature of that year provided for the enumeration of those who were aided by the township, and it showed that more than 82,000 received aid from the township trustees, or about one in thirty of the population of the State. The effect of that was the passage of other laws, with the result that the amount of relief has since been reduced to $210,000 in one year; and the average annual reduction below that of 1895 is more than $340,000. Nearly $5,000,000 has been saved to the State since the passage of the first reform law, and the number aided has been reduced more than 31,000 a year on an average.

All of these reports pass through our office. They are recorded and filed for reference. So we have had some very interesting experiences; a few of these I will mention. South Bend is one of our most prosperous cities. When the law of 1899 was passed, requiring that township trustees, whenever they had given relief to the amount of $15,000 should submit a statement before giving further relief, the result was that the trustee of that township resigned. The Commissioners appointed a successor, an excellent business man. He looked matters over and at the end of sixty days he asked for an interview with the Board of County Commissioners. He presented to them the names of 116 persons who he said were permanent charges, and who would have to be taken care of by the county. The Commissioners said "the poor asylum cannot take any more," and at the end of a half day's discussion they said, "If we have to take this burden we had better take it in warm weather than in cold; we will fit up some of the buildings until we can erect the necessary structures, so you give orders and send to the poor asylum. Now how many of the 116 do you think went. How many accepted the kind offer? There were just three out of the 116. Forty-five of them were able to get along, and the remainder left the county and most of them went into Michigan. The result is that where the trustee had previously expended $18,500, it was reduced to less than $2,500 the first year, and the money levied those years for poor relief isn't all used up yet. That was eleven years ago. The best people in South Bend, whether they are teachers or ministers or physicians or business men, will say that the poor were never so well cared for as they have been since the passage of that law, and they haven't spent as much in the past seven or eight years as they did in 1898.

I recall one county in the western part of the State where in a dilapidated cabin there was a sick woman. They sent for the township physician. He went to the cabin and it was so dark inside he couldn't see anything. He struck a match and saw in the corner on a mass of dirty clothing, covered with rags, a human form. He found the sick woman, and examined her, and on the way to the door he stepped on a dog. The dog howled and he kicked it out of the door. He asked whose it was and she said it was Jimmie's dog, he was a blooded dog, and that he paid $5.00 for it." He said, "What do you feed it on," and she replied, "We feed it on condensed milk." Yet they were all dependent upon the overseer of the poor.

One of the most curious reports that came in those early days, giving the cause of relief of the person aided, etc., it said, "Two dollars for a marriage license." (Laughter).

It was said the result of the passage of this law would be to fill the poor asylums and the children's homes; politicians were up in arms. They besieged the Attorney-General, and he came to our office. He said in some counties they would have to send fifty per cent of the people who had been aided, to the poor asylums in the next three months. We told him such a thing was contrary to all human experience. There never has been a time when the cutting off of official relief had overrun the charitable institutions.

Now, there was a decrease of more than $110,000 in the amount of money paid out the first year. In the next ten years there was, each year, a decreasing number of inmates in the county poor asylums. The character of the population also has changed. Where we used to have but thirty-four per cent of old persons, now our poor asylums have become institutions for old people, more than half of them being over sixty years of age. Many of them are physically or mentally defective, and the population has almost continuously decreased. Generally, for the past fifteen years there has been a gradual decrease; and in the population of the orphans' homes, also.

Now the township overseer of the poor is the one who makes a pauper a public charge. Under the present law a dependent child has to be made a ward by the Judge of the Juvenile Court. He is the only means of making children county charges. Out of the county poor asylums have come all those cases that the State assumed the care of those that the counties were unable to care for. In this State the Quakers (of whom we always like to speak with the highest regard) were the first to establish a hospital for the insane. In other matters along this line the Eastern States have led in one thing after the other.

The hospitals for the insane are doing, each year, a better and better work. They have been raised to a higher standard, and now in many States a person who is affected mentally, in a mild degree, may voluntarily place himself in charge of the Superintendent of a hospital for the insane. In many States the State is the only agency that cares for the insane. In some other States there are county asylums for the chronic insane. And I may say that I am very favorably impressed with the work done in some of the county asylums. I haven't visited the institutions of that kind in this State, but I have in Wisconsin.

The first institution for the deaf was established in Hartford, Conn., which was followed by others, and they were followed by the institutions for the blind. We should always look upon these places as schools. They are not for the care of adults, as a rule, but for the care and training of children. The education of the children in these institutions is very interesting. Any good teacher who can teach seeing children can teach the blind.

The memory of the blind is remarkable. I have great admiration for the work they do, and when I see them going over the demonstration of a theorem in algebra or a proposition in geometry covering two or three printed pages and give it without the use of pen or paper it is a marvel to me. With the deaf children it is different. The teachers for the deaf have to be specially trained. Most of the children who come to the deaf schools are foreign to our thoughts and language. We are to them a strange people, and their sentiments and ideas are entirely different from ours. One of the most interesting things I have seen is an arrangement brought from Germany—a mirror placed on the wall high enough for the child to see its mouth. The teacher teaches the child, as it looks in the morror, the positions in which to place its tongue and lips, in order to enunciate the letters and utter the sounds of the language. The children are being taught how to speak by looking into a glass. The teacher has to have infinite patience in such work.

Another recent invention in the schools for the deaf is the use of the musical scale. The teacher impresses the child with the relative standing of the notes or vowels, and the child learns to give expression in high or low accent, as they are placed on the musical scale.

The next group that comes out of the poor asylums is dependent children. In some States they are still found there in large numbers. And that is true in some of our more progressive States, but in other places an effort has been made to get them out—to remove them from the undesirable classes that congregate in the poor asylums. In some States they have established a State Orphans' Home. This began in Massachusetts, and then in Michigan and Colorado and other Western States. In Pennsylvania they originated the system of County Children's Homes, and Ohio followed that, and our State also. We established some fifty, and then concluded we should stop. Some twenty years ago an active effort was begun in Indiana to find homes for children in private families. In 1897 all children who were public charges were made wards of the State, and the records of all the children of the State now have to pass through the office of the Board of State Charities. If they are put in improper homes we have the authority to remove them and return them to the county from which they came. The law now defines a truant child, a neglected child, a dependent child, and a delinquent child. When they are made wards of the State it is an offense to interfere with them. We have gone further: We have added a supplement, to this effect, that any person who contributes to the neglect or is responsible for the dependency of the child shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and may be fined not more than $500 and confined in the county jail or workhouse not to exceed six months. We find it to be a very wholesome law.

We have a law in our State that makes the desertion of the children and wife a felony, and we have brought offenders from other States. The Judge has the right to suspend sentence on any man, provided he will agree from that time on to support his family. Many men are doing that. The result of these laws has been that at present the Juvenile Court in Indianapolis is dealing more with those who have contributed to delinquenty or dependenty than it is with the children themselves.

The next group to be taken out of our county poor asylums in some of the States is the feeble-minded. What are we going to do with the feeble-minded? That is a great problem that is ahead of us. Those who are not insane, but who are not able to protect themselves. I know a family of five generations, in which there are 108 or 110 members and none of them able to reach the fourth grade in the public schools. They include candidates for every kind of custodial institution. What is going to be done with them? Whether in a little country town or a small or a large city, they are a problem. We can proceed with the insane person under the law; they are not supposed to be responsible under the law for the commission of a crime, but there is no such recognition of the feeble-minded, or of the epileptic. So it is left with us to handle this great problem without such aid from the law.

You have two splendid institutions in this State for the feeble-minded, and other States have them. They are receiving the children from the poor asylums and the orphans' homes. But we come to the question of the adult feeble-minded. What are we going to do with them? They are making a canvass in New Jersey, studying the history of all the feeble-minded in the State by special agents.

In my own State we have passed a law providing for the custodial care of feeble-minded women over sixteen. This law has been in effect some eight years, and we have 135 such women under our care. I was there one day when a mother and her four children were brought to that institution by the Sheriff. Some time ago I looked over the poor asylum records and selected five women—the only proviso being that they were mothers—we know they had been the mothers of nineteen children, fifteen of them had been public charges, some of them as much as ten years. In that time they had cost the State more than $15,000, and at that time ten of them were on public support. If fifteen years ago those five women could have been cared for in our custodial institutions for feeble-minded what a saving it would have been. Even from a financial standpoint it would have been a great saving, to say nothing of the saving of misery and degeneracy.

The next class to be taken out of the poor asylums perhaps was the epileptics, and the institutions for that class are comparatively recent. We have come to realize that the insane, the feeble-minded, and the epileptics represent three different forms of neurotic disease. It is necessary for the public to be informed as to what is necessary to do with them. Sixty per cent of all the children where the parents are feeble-minded are feeble-minded themselves, and about seventy per cent are feeble-minded, insane, or epileptic. Feeble-minded children are usually born with that mental defect. It is a disease of infancy. They are blighted minds. Epilepsy is a disease of young life. Eighty per cent of the epileptics are so before they are twenty-one years old. Insanity is largely a disease of adult life. The public needs to be informed as to the menace the defectives are to society and how necessary it is to take custodial care of them, and train them, and treat them, so as to restore to society all possible, and those that cannot be restored to keep them in custody while they live.

We do not know what epilepsy is. There is one interesting thing about them—that is, that their seizures are very much like an electrical shock. The epileptic child isn't wanted in church or school or in the home. It has been noted that they forget much that has been learned within a short time prior to the occurrence of one of the seizures. But the thing they learn through their fingers they seem to never forget. Consequently manual employment of the epileptic is the most promising thing for him. We have established an epileptic colony on 1,245 acres of land, and it is a delight to see what is being done. I have seen cases that have been locked up in jail for years. One boy who had been eight years in jail works almost every day driving a team on that farm. The other day when I was there they had 116 men and boys; 113 of them were at work, and seventy of them were at work in a 250-acre corn field. As I think of them all in idleness in the various county institutions it does my heart good to know what is being done for them.

In many asylums there are many persons who are afflicted with tuberculosis. The counties are not able to do much for this class, but the State can do it, and in many places they are establishing sanatoriums.

As the county poor farm was the primary charitable institution, so the county jail was the primary correctional institution. Then came the necessity for the State to do something for those who had violated the State laws. In the development of prisons we have two great systems—the Pennsylvania system and the New York, or Auburn, system. There were gathered in these prisons men and boys, women and girls. Then came the question of separating the boys. The first institution was the House of Refuge on Randall's Island, New York. Then came the question of separating the girls, and institutions were provided for girls. Then came the Reformatory for young men, the first one at Elmira, N. Y.; and then the Reformatory for women, the first of which was established at Indianapolis. In your State you have such splendid institutions as your two prisons, the Reformatory at Huntingdon, and the two excellent Houses of Refuge, respectively, for girls and boys in the eastern part of the State, and the splendid school at Morganza—all there are institutions that are leading, in some respects, in the care of these classes.

The International Prison Congress has just met in Washington. There were present representatives from forty governments. Perhaps more governments were gathered together than ever before. What was the result? They came to this country saying, "We want to see four things—your refomatories, your juvenile courts, and we want to understand your probation and your indeterminate sentence and parole system."

They were taken on a tour of 2,200 miles of the United States. They were welcomed at the White House by the President. They met in in the hall of the American Republic, and there they considered these questions, and what was the result? They adopted resolutions, approving the reformatory system, the indeterminate sentence, the juvenile court, and the parole system. Most of these were adopted unanimously. Now they will make reports to their respective governments of the results of this meeting. I believe there isn't one of us who can foresee the tremendous importance of that great meeting, to humanity, all over the world. Sir Evelyn Ruggles Brise said to me: "From this time on the United States, and not Europe, will be the center of influence in the administration of criminal law and in prison reform."

In many of the States we are just beginning to realize that the convict, the person adjudged to be an offender, has to be cared for and treated and trained and, if possible, returned to society reformed, or, if that is not possible, restrained as long as necessary for the safety of the public. We are just beginning to understand that he is a problem, and that the problem of the treatment of the offender is ours, and it is not a question of the treatment of crime. The great lessons we learned from this gathering in Washington are two, in addition to what I mentioned: First, that the treatment of the offender must be an individual question, and the other is that the thing toward which we must look is the out-door employment of all prisoners that it is possible to employ outside of the institution. (Applause.)

While our visitors were very complimentary to us in regard to our institutions and our penal system, so far as the State is concerned, they could not be severe enough regarding our county jail system (that institution that trains more criminals than it cures), and they had much to say about the demoralizing effect of that on our country. It is coming to this—if an offender offend against the State that the State should deal with him, and not some local authority. He should be sent to a State workhouse. We are coming to that, and I should like, in Pennsylvania, where you have the opportunity, to see you lead in that.

Now, I have talked long enough. I have outlined a few of the problems that every State has to deal with, and have attempted to suggest what is properly the work of the local authorities and what is properly the work of the State.

You, by your presence here, have shown your interest in these great problems. They appeal to a corps of interested workers in every State in the Union. In many States they have not as many persons interested in these questions as you have in Pennsylvania. In some States the interest is confined to a few people. You are to be congratulated for the interest that is taken in this State. And now, while you are thinking about it yourselves, let us think of the people in the other States where they haven't yet the public interest, where they have but few who are interested in these problems, and let us assist them to awaken to a realization of the fact that they have problems with which to deal that the whole community of their State should be vitally interested in.

This is a thing that comes to us all, because State lines do not bar poverty or crime. There are no State lines to this question, but we should all work together, hand in hand, looking to Him who is able to guide and lead us in all good things. (Applause.)

Mr. Colborn: Mr. Torrance telegraphed me to-day that he could not be here, but he has sent his address and it will be read by Mr. Charles Weller, of Pittsburg. I have the pleasure of introducing Mr. Weller to the audience.

Mr. Weller: Being foisted upon you as a substitute, I am reminded of an incident in the career of Dr. Talmadge, in his early days. He had arranged for a baptism where he had instructed the janitor of the church to stand in a certain place just above the font and to be ready when the convert was raised from the water to let down on his head a beautiful white dove. Dr. Talmadge preached an impressive sermon and proceeded with the baptism, and was about to let the convert down into the water, when from the heights above the font came a voice, which some of the audience heard: "Mr. Talmadge, Mr. Talmadge, the cat has eat up the dove; shall I let down the cat?" (Laughter.)

Mr. Weller here read the following interesting paper, prepared by the Hon. Francis J. Torrance, President of the Board of Public Charities, of Pittsburg, which was received with applause:

PAPER BY MR. TORRANCE.

The Work of the Board of Public Charities.

It is fitting, on an occasion of this kind, to review the history of the subject which calls us together and at the same time marks the progress attained.

I am a firm believer, and always have been, in associational gatherings and their work. It is by such gatherings that knowledge is best disseminated; the exchange of ideas, the friendly criticism, the pointed suggestion all tend toward the uplifting of those whose charges are our great care.

Man is gregarious in the highest sense of the term. The more enilghtened the race, the more desired is conference, convention, and association. Hence we come together with the highest good of a common cause.

The study of the history of pauperism, and the care of the poor and the charities incident thereto is a most interesting subject for the student of sociology or civics. The foremost nations to whom we may look for accomplishment in modern times are England, France, Germany, and our own beloved country.

As many of our laws, customs, and habits are acquired from England, let us briefly review the history of pauperism in Endland, for it is valuable as well as interesting, and it will be noted in what measure our present system has been evolved from that of England.

The earliest legislation affecting the poor was of a preventive character and aimed against vagrancy and aimed also to localize the care of the pauper, placing it on the parish or church in which the subject resided. In the latter part of the fourteenth century, under the second Richard, the first legislation is recorded and provided severe penalties for vagrancy and imposed the care of the impotent poor upon the parish, as noted above. Nothing else of this character is recorded until the time of Henry VIII., whose destruction of the monasteries and hospitals, so well known to us all, caused widespread distress throughout England. He first authorized the licensing of beggars and alloting a prescribed territory in which the pauper might beg. This, of course, was unfortunate and was by no means a solution of the problem. The condition became worse, and vagrancy and destitution so aggravated that during the first half of the sixteenth century was the real commencement of the English poor law so often referred to, the substance of which law was a separation of the impotent poor from the vagrant, requiring those able to work to be furnished work and those unable for labor to be supported by the parish or district. The means for their support was furnished through alms collected in the churches on Sunday. From this dates the separation from the ecclesiastical to the secular treatment of the question.

During the reign of Elizabeth still greater progress was made in the transition from Church to State, and under this monarch we find the first record of a levy or tax for the support of the poor. The word "overseer," so common to us now, was first used in reference to the poor during the reign of this Queen, and just at the dawn of the seventeenth century the present English poor law, the law on which England still administers, with slight modifications, her care of the poor, was enacted.

The basic law was really a unification of the various previous enactments, and under Queen Elizabeth's wise treatment of the subject the worthy poor were separated from the other, or worthless class, and also separated the children, providing for the latter an apprenticeship system. Of the adults, those able to work were put to work and only the worthy poor or disabled were accepted as a public charge and were cared for in public almshouses. The theory of the Elizabethan policy was well founded. Its principles were just, and for almost a hundred years it worked without any modification.

The first act modifying the Elizabethan laws was when the workhouse plan was adopted. It is interesting to note that the word "settlement," now so commonly used in connection with charity work and particularly the care of the indigent insane, is first used in connection with the modification of the law of Elizabeth, an act being called "The Settlement Act" passed during the latter half of the seventeenth century. The substance of the act was that the poor authorities granted relief only to those who had legal residence within their respective bounds. This legal residence was difficult to acquire unless absolutely established by birth. The law resulted in great cruelty to the poor, and, strange to say, it lasted over a hundred years with little or no modification.

In 1723 an act authorizing parishes to unite for the establishment of workhouses was passed, whereby parishes might unite or consolidate for the housing, support, and possible employment of the poor. The word "workhouse," in connection with the care of the poor, is unknown to us in our State and sounds harsh. We must remember, however, that the spread of pauperism and vagrancy in England had reached such a state that it was putting a premium on vagrancy to care for all classes seeking aid without distinction. The worthy poor were imposed upon and those well able to work were seeking and receiving alms, and the cost of support was burdensome upon the communities, and an attempt through the "workhouse test" was made to segregate those worthy from those unworthy. The administration of this plan resulted in hardship in many cases, as does almost any great change from a well-established method. The law itself may not have been unjust, but its administration was, and the denial of support—a roof and food was a great hardship on some—although it did result in a wonderful reduction in the pauper population.

The "allowance system" as it was called, instituted just at the close of the eighteenth century, by which it was proposed to relieve all poor families whose income was small or insufficient, was a complete failure, and clearly shows that the care of the pauper and the administration of charity must be done systematically, intelligently, and conscientiously. Under the "allowance system" poverty was promoted in England to such an extent that from the previous sum of about $10,000,000 annually at the beginning of the system, 1783, the enormous sum of $40,000,000 had been reached in less than thirty years. And the per capita tax had increased just six times during the same period. The commission appointed by Parliament early in the nineteenth century disclosed a terrible state of public corruption, and in 1834 the poor law was amended. The principal aim of this amendment was the centralization of authority for the government of the poor, the redistricting, for instance, of the counties into small or compact subdivisions known as "Poor Law Unions" and governed by a Board of Guardians, and the only practical change in the present poor laws of England to-day is the placing of the control of authority in the local government board instead of the guardians referred to. The support of the poor in England is to-day derived from local taxation, the general government having no hand in the matter as to the pauper, but does, in other respects or for other classes, such as schools for dependent children, the insane, and other defective classes.

I have taken much of your valuable time to give this resume of the English poor law because it has been considered the best and has been used as the foundation of laws in many other countries in the administration for the poor.

The French handle the question in a very different way from the English and we. Their main difference is that relief is granted in the home of a needy person and that they do not aim in that country at the institutional control or administration for the pauper. This is only deviated from where it is impossible to care for him in his own home. One of the fundamental principles of the French custom is that it never recognizes any legal right on the part of the applicant for alms or care, but that what is given is purely charity or benevolence, and by no means a right in any way or claim upon the public or the government.

In France the present system dates from the Revolution. Previous to that time the question of charity and pauperism was handled entirely by the Church. The present active administration is centralized under an act passed in 1886 and the entire system of relief is under State control, a complete separation from the Church.

Another difference in the French plan is that direct grants are made from the public funds and not by specific taxation, as in other countries. One of the great means for raising funds for the poor is the gross receipts on all places of amusement, a direct tax being specifically levied for this purpose. There is a consistency in this matter because the citizen who is being amused is directly contributing for the support, if not comfort, of the pauper who has no such enjoyment.

In Germany the government lays down no specific or general law for the care of the poor. It does, however, recognize a legal obligation to the destitute and allows the various political districts or subdivisions, municipalities, etc., the right to care for its own poor in such proper way as it may elect. The present system in Germany dates only from the nineteenth century. Previous to that time the care or relief of the poor was in a very unsettled condition. The system known as the "Eberfeldt Plan," instituted about 1852, was the first systematic work for poor relief. It provides for the division of territory and a classification by personal inspection on the part of visitors. The matters are taken up and discussed in detail, and, while the visitor himself does not grant the relief, it is finally distributed on the recommendation of the visitor by the Municipal Board, composed of the Mayor and certain members of the Municipal Council, probably as in some of our own cities known as the "Poor Committee" or "Charity Committee."

The "Eberfeldt System" still prevails in Germany, and, while it has not been copied in its entirety in any English-speaking land, many of its features are instituted in organized charities elsewhere. The system is, however, pretty generally used throughout the German Empire and its dependencies.

The United States, as I intimated in my remarks on the English system, bases her system on the English poor law and had its beginning almost in the earliest history of our country. The poor relief was centered in the poorhouse, a word, by the way, I always disliked. It sounds harsh and unfeeling, and the word "county home" sounds so much better.

We have done well by the helpless in our country, and when I speak of them I speak not only of the pauper, but the individual generally, the defective in their various classes, mentally and physically.

So far I have treated the question with little distinction or classification, for in the earlier periods in our own, as in all other countries, there was little, if any, classification or distinction, but we come to a period of segregation and distinctive charity, when the pauper is cared for as such and without question of any physical or mental disability or deformity, but where the other many classes of our defective and dependent are cared for as their particular ailment requires.

The first great classification—those afflicted with mental disability, acute or chronic; after this the deaf, the dumb, the blind, the epileptic, the crippled, the diseased in their various stages.

I shall not tire you with statistical statements and, owing to the movement of population under institutional care, a census does not count for a great deal, but it is interesting to note that in the United States, at the last census for the specific purpose of obtaining correct population in institutions of a benevolent character, and which census was taken in 1904, the population recorded was 283,809. As a proof of the movement of population and the activity of inmates, it is astounding to record that over 2,000,000 persons, or, to be exact, 2,040,372 persons, were admitted, and almost this same number were dismissed, showing a population on the last day of the same year of 284,362 persons. When you consider that out of every hundred thousand population in the United States, 347 persons are cared for in institutions of some kind, you will realize the importance of symtematized charity and intelligent institutional management.

And now we come by natural gravitation to our own State. Not that Pennsylvania is by any means a sunken State, for a State that takes as good care of its dependents and defectives as Pennsylvania can well hold up its head at the mention of public or private charities. The public charities of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania are supervised by a board of ten Commissioners, whose duties are defined by an enactment in 1869, which has been supplemented at various times in subsequent sessions of the Legislature. Its duties call for a general supervision of the institutions in the State, charitable, reformatory, and correctional; their methods of teaching, the management of their inmates, the conduct of the personnel, whether officer, employee, or inmate; the financial conduct and condition of the institution, the physical property, and all matters incident to the institutions. The powers of the board are advisory, and the only exceptions which give mandatory power are those relative to reports of the various institutions to the board; the submission on the part of Overseers and Directors of the Poor, the County Commissioners or other county authorities of their plans for jails or almshouses. Therefore, practically the arbitrary powers of the board are restricted to the approval of plans for jails, almshouses, or county hospitals and the forms in which reports shall be made and submitted. Special acts are passed from time to time appropriating specific sums for buildings, with the proviso that the said plans shall have the approval of the Board of Public Charities.

This brief detail of the powers of the board will serve to show that its powers are almost wholly advisory. It is pleasant to note, however, the almost entire absence of friction between the board and the various boards of management or officers of institutions coming within its purview, and under such harmonious relations good is sure to exist and the greatest effectiveness for the institutions and their various charges sure to obtain.

The growth of charity in the number of institutions and in amounts of money contributed for the support thereof is possibly the best barometer or gauge of what has been and is being done. The earliest record we have in our files gives the appropriations and the number of institutions is 1850, at which time there was a total of seven institutions, three of them of the first class, viz: The Eastern and Western Penitentiaries and the Lunatic Asylum, as it was then called, in Harrisburg. To these three institutions the sum of $69,166.50 was appropriated.

There were four other institutions at that period not recognized as State institutions, but which received State aid for the service rendered in the care or custody of the several classes of dependents. The total amount of the appropriations for the seven institutions reached a sum less than $135,000.

The last printed report, 1908, shows appropriations to thirty-two State institutions amounting to $6,200,000 for two fiscal years, and to institutions not under State control, 224, with appropriations amounting to $5,500,000, or an aggregate of 256 institutions receiving State aid to the amount of $11,700,000. To this munificence must be added the annual appropriations of $1,500,000 for the care of the indigent insane. Also that most worthy charity—the prevention and cure of tuberculosis among the indigent of the Commonwealth—$1,000,000 annually.

Charity cannot be measured by a dollar and cents standard, but truly a State appropriating annually $8,350,000 shows its good intent and certainly has at heart the welfare of its various wards in their respective classes. One of the most important functions of the Board of Public Charities is that of the care of the insane, which department of the work is in the hands of the Committee on Lunacy, provided for by the Act of 1883, by which five Commissioners were added to the original number, making ten in all. By the provisions of the act one shall be a practicing physician and one a lawyer. To this committee is delegated all the details incident to the care and treatment of the insane, the management of the various institutions, hospitals, asylums, and homes in which they are housed or confined.

I shall not touch upon the medical or technical questions involved in this great branch of charity, but now that I have this representative body as an audience and the honor of appearing before you, I desire to take the occasion of advancing the objects of the amended acts to the lunacy law relative to what we commonly know as "county care." This amendment, passed in 1897, in substance provides that wherever any county, municipality, borough, or township will supply a suitable institution for the maintenance of the indigent insane upon such plan as will meet the approval of the Board of Charities it will be licensed by the Committee on Lunacy to receive from the State treasury the sum of $2 per week for each patient cared for. The requirements, in brief, are that the institution shall provide treatment on a par with that accorded the patient if in a State hospital, and, of course, that the institution will abide by the rules of the Committee on Lunacy, as provided in he lunacy law.

The overcrowded condition is so patent to you all that it needs no comment at my hands. The increase in insanity seems to be greater in percentage than the increase of population generally. I will not discuss the causes, for they are not of material incident to us at this time, and whether it be from increased longevity due to better medical treatment or rules of life applying to the body and which have not yet become applicable to the brain or whether it is the strenuousness of the age we live in, are all questions best left to the alienist and not the layman. Nevertheless, we have the condition confronting us. Relief can best and quickest be obtained by action under the County Care act. The erection of State institutions is a slow process. It is slow under the most favorable circumstances. County hospitals may be quickly provided in comparison to the large institution, and the law has already paved the way. No additional legislation is needed. From a financial standpoint I believe it a paying investment for any county, municipality, of other political subdivision of the Commonwealth. Further than this, it is the right and charitable thing to do. It is our great regret that more districts have not availed themselves of the benefits of the act.

In closing, let me urge upon you the earnest consideration of this question. We have made long strides in the care of our dependents since the inception of public charity. Let us take a step further along the lines of taking care of these helpless wards of ours and give them speedy relief. I am a firm believer that a faithful compliance with the provisions of the County Care act will prove a boon to those whom it is inteded to protect and provide for, and that the authorities making such provision will be amply rewarded in the results, to say nothing of the financial benefit, which should be the last consideration in caring for the helpless in all classes, providing the amounts are honestly and consistently expended.

I should like also to call your attention to the expense, to say nothing of the annoyance, danger, and hardship of a strict adherence or compliance with an amendment to the lunacy act which provides that each and every female patient or inmate shall be provided with a female attendant accompanying such patient or inmate on the occasion of her transfer from one institution or from her home or place of settlement to an institution. By providing the home, hospital, or asylum, whichever you may term it, for your own neighborhood, you will avoid much of the cost and eliminate greatly the element of danger. Those of you who have been so long in the work, and whom I have for so many years met in connection with it, will know this and agree with me without, I believe, further argument or illustration.

Mr. Colborn: Dr. Dixon, who was invited to deliver an address to-night, wrote me that he was anxious to be with us and would make an effort to be here. Later he wrote me again that he would be here or send a substitute for his lecture. I haven't heard anything from him since.

I want to express my great pleasure in hearing the paper read by Mr. Weller, coming from Mr. Torrance. This is the first time we have been able to get anything from him at these conventions. Years ago the Board of Charities were always visitors at our conventions. Mr. Cadwalader Biddle, the Central Agent and Secretary, whom I look upon as the best they ever had or possibly will have for some time, was always here. It was a great pleasure for him to be with us and a great pleasure for the Association to have him with us. He was a help to the Association, and, as he expressed it, the Association was a great help to him in the administration of his duties.

Mr. Bromley Wharton, Secretary of the Board of Charities for two years, has been invited and accepted the assignment that was made to him, and at the last moment wrote, this year and last, "Urgent business in another part of the State takes me away." He ought to be here; it was his duty to be here. It is the duty of the Board of Charities to assist and aid in the work of this Association. The Association has the right to expect the support and aid of the Board of Public Charities. I was much pleased, then, to know that Mr. Torrance had given us his aid and support, as the President of the Board of Public Charities; and when he could not be here sent his valuable paper. I want to say that it was this Association which first advocated the county care of the insane throughout the State. Mr. Lawrence, of Philadelphia; Mr. McGonnigle, of Pittsburg, and others for several years strongly advocated the adoption of a law that would give the counties the care of the chronic insane. I think Brother Butler to-night touched the key-note, and I am sorry he wasn't here when the excellent paper of Mrs. Comfort was read. Mr. Butler made us feel the responsibility resting upon us. We will go home appreciating more fully the positions we fill than ever before.

There have been many things said here to-day that I was pleased to hear—by Mr. Eshleman, Mrs. Comfort, Mrs. Frampton, Mr. Butler, and by the Hon. Francis J. Torrance. It has been to me one of the most valuable days this Association has had in years, and I am sorry to-night that "Ben-Hur" was a greater attraction to some than this Convention. (Applause.)

Mr. Robb, Allegheny: The Directors of Allegheny County have taken up the question of changing the law in relation to desertion. We have had our Solicitor prepare an act making desertion of wife or children a felony, the same as the law in the State of Indiana. For the purpose of getting this before the Committee on Resolutions I would ask that it be read at this time and referred to that committee.

Mr. Colborn here read the paper referred to.

Mr. Osche moves that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Resolutions, with a favorable recommendation. This motion is seconded by a delegate.

Mr. Weller: I am deeply interested in this question of desertion and non-support. I urge that this be not passed for the present until further consideration, and for this reason: Mr. Baldwin, who has made a very thorough study of the laws of the country, is earnestly urging that desertion shall not be made a felony. He says he has the testimony of the Governors of many States that a misdemeanor can be extradicted as well as a felony. In a felony it usually requires a more expensive mode of trial, and I think these cases should be made as easy for the wife as possible. If we, in our various localities, will urge extradition under the present law we can secure it. I ask you to go slow before you make the offense a felony. In Pittsburg we are assured by the authorities that we can bring these men back. Do not make it a felony until we have thoroughly tested the question.

There was one matter mentioned that I think is a good thing. Let us work together to have a law whereby, if a deserter is confined in the workhouse, the wife may be paid fifty cents a day out of the public treasury for his labor while he is there. It soon teaches the man that he would rather make $1.50 a day for himself than to make fifty cents a day for his wife.

Mr. Osche: This act was drawn by our attorney. I have had him working for a month or six weeks trying to discover some law by which we could bring these men back, like a case we have where the man has gone to Minnesota, but he has failed to discover anything.

Mr. Weller: There is a man present who is a National student on this question. I would like to hear from him.

Mr. Crocker, Williamsport: I am interested in this question. I went to my office to find a pamphlet on this question which contains a form of act that has been under discussion by the Conference of National Commissioners, and which has just been adopted in its final form for presentation as a uniform form of the desertion act to the Legislatures of every State this coming winter. It is based on the act which obtains in the District of Columbia, which was drafted by Mr. Baldwin. The substance of the bill contains nearly all of the provisions that are contained in the paper just read to you, except as to matter of detail. I am going to suggest that you do not act hastily on this matter; it is a large subject. Our committee had four sessions over that bill before they were satisfied with its form.

Mr. Weller desires me to speak on the question of desertion being made a misdemeanor or a felony. Mr. Baldwin's table shows that eight States make the offense a felony and nearly forty States make it a misdemeanor. As a misdemeanor it is as much extraditable as it is as a felony, under the act of Congress. The Govenors of almost every State have extradited offenders and sent them back to States where they were misdemeanors. There was an attempt on the part of the committee at the conference to introduce a clause which would cover the desertion of illegitimate, as well as legitimate, children; but that clause, when it came to the conference, was stricken out on the ground that every State has what are known as bastardy laws, which are considered sufficient protection for illegitimate children, and that clause was thought inadvisable. I thank you for your attention. I suggest that this matter be thoroughly sifted and gone over carefully by your committe, instead of taking action upon it without a full understanding of all he points involved.

Col. E. P. Gould, Erie: I was very anxious, as Chairman of the Committee on Resolutions, that this committee be instructed. I have some positive convictions. I agree with the gentleman that it doesn't have to be a felony to be extraditable.

I hold to the fact that one-half of all the wife desertions that occur in this country that the blame is more on the wife than on the husband. There are women I know of I would rather go to purgatory than to attempt to live with her, and for a man to be made a felon if he attempts to leave such a woman I don't think is right. If a man has a child I think he should support it, but in the case of the wife, in some cases, he is more sinned against than sinning.

Hon. E. A. Boyne, Bradford, who was received with applause: We have a man now in the State of Virginia who ran away from Bradford and left his wife and three children. We had to give them a little support and I thought I believed in adopting the Delaware method—to tie him to the whipping post get some good husky woman, who had been deserted in the same way, to give it to him good and hard. I hope to see this law passed. There are so many men leaving their wives and children. And there are almost as many women leaving their families as there are men that leave theirs. But I think the men are still in the majority, and I think it will get worse unless something is done to prevent it.

Mr. Bennett, Allegheny: I have known something about trying to bring a man from one State to another, charged with a misdemeanor, and in my experience it couldn't be done unless there was information made against him and be taken before the grand jury and an indictment found before requisition papers could be gotten, and if you did get papers and went to another State the Governor wouldn't sign them. Allegheny County is burdened with the wives and children that have been deserted. We asked our Solicitor to draw up this bill, and I do hope that the Governors will become so interested in this that we can bring men back for a misdemeanor.

Hon. A. W. Butler is called for.

Mr. Butler: I don't care to say anything that will influence our friends in Pennsylvania in doing what they want to do. We didn't want the form of law that Mr. Baldwin proposed in Indiana. The position taken by our Governor and others was that the Governors wouldn't ordinarily give extradition papers for a misdemeanor; they might or might not. But that they wouldn't pay the same attention to it that they would if it were made a felony. Our law has worked very satisfactorily with us. The law to which I referred allows us to handle a great many cases we don't care to have made a felony. When it is necessary to go after them we can do so, under our law, and we don't fail to get them. We prefer to have the law as it is.

The question of referring to the Committee on Resolutions, with a favorable recommendation, is called for, and upon vote it is agreed to.

The Convention here adjourned until to-morrow morning.

PROCEEDINGS OF WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1910.

The Convention met, as per adjournment, at 9:30 a. m. and was called to order by President Wilson.

Prayer was offered by the Rev. James R. Baker, of Williamsport.

Hon. E. A. Boyne, Bradford: I would like to know the judgment of the Directors in regard to the State appropriation. I would like to ask if they can get their poor into the county hospital. Does the appropriation that comes from the State to the city or couny guarantee the right to put the poor into the hospitals?

Mr. Mackin, Luzerne: In the Central Poor District of Luzerne we have two hospitals. We pay them $750 each a year for the care of indigent cases.

Edward D. Sollenberger, Secretary C. A. S., Philadelphia, was here introduced to the Convention and read the following interesting paper, which was received with applause:

PURPOSES AND METHODS OF THE CHILDREN'S AID SOCIETIES.

Edwin D. Sollenberger, General Secretary C. A. S., Philadelphia.

A recent writer has said, "Every child has a right to be brought up under such conditions as to give it a chance to become a good citizen of the Nation." To give such an opportunity to homeless, neglected, and friendless children, without distinction as to race, creed, or color, is the main purpose of the Children's Aid Society of Pennsylvania. The methods used by the society, in providing either temporary or permanent care, make it possible to give due regard to the religious faith of the child and also to the matter of age, sex, and color.

The society believes that the children coming into its care should be given, as far as possible, the same love and the same individual training and attention that other children in the community receive from right-minded parents. To accomplish this we place the children, as soon as possible, in carefully selected private families, with or without payment of board, according to circumstances. They are treated as own children and given all the advantages which the average child in a good home and a good community receives.

The many good homes all over Pennsylvania ready to receive homeless children constitute a great and most important resource of the community for the care and training of children of this class. To make the most of this opportunity, the Children's Aid Society has developed an efficient home-fiinding department, an up-to-date system, and an adequate force of trained agents. Every effort is made to select carefully the foster-homes and to fit the child and the home together with discrimination.

After a child has been placed in a good home a very important step has been taken to secure the individual oversight and care which he needs, but the society's interest in and oversight of its wards does not end at this point. It keeps closely in touch with the children placed in families by means of the visits of its trained agents, by correspondence, and by co-operation with local committees. It also receives frequent school teachers' and pastors' reports regarding the progress and welfare of the child.

The opinion of experienced workers now is that young children should not be permanently separated from their parents except for "urgent and compelling reasons," such as immorality or hopeless inefficiency. This has been one of the foundation principles of the Children's Aid Society from its earliest history. The society holds further that children of parents of industrious habits, suffering from temporary misfortune, and children of good mothers left destitute by the death or desertion of the bread-winners, should as a rule be kept with their parents, such aid as is necessary being given in their own homes.

To prevent as far as possible the separation of infants from destitute widows, deserted wives, and unmarried mothers, the Children's Aid Society maintains a special department, which provides situations for and otherwise assists such mothers. This plan enabled hundreds of mothers, each with one child and some with two children, eventually to become self-supporting and to give their children the love and care which they need.

The Children's Aid Society is prepared to receive children from the Overseers or Guardians or Directors of the Poor under the terms of an act of Assembly, approved June 13, 1883, "To prohibit the receiving and retaining of children in almshouses and poorhouses and to provide for the care of such children." The Children's Aid Society is the oldest distinctively home-finding and placing-out agency for dependent and neglected children in Pennsylvania, and it was the first to offer its services for the removal of children, under this law, from the almshouses. The facilities of the society to find homes for children are at the disposal both of the Judges of the Juvenile Courts and the officers of city and county poor boards and departments of charity. Inquiries in regard to the care of children will receive prompt attention. The society is also ready to receive children in accordance with an act of Assembly approved by Gov. Pennypacker April 23, 1903, entitled "an act defining the powers of the several Courts of Quarter Sessions of the Peace within this Commonwealth, with reference to the care, treatment, and control of dependent, neglected, incorrigible, and delinquent children under the age of sixteen years, and providing for the means by which such powers may be exercised." Sections 4 to 10, inclusive, of this act define the circumstances and conditions under which the Children's Aid Society receives children from Juvenile Courts. Children suitable to be placed boarding in private families may be committed to the society through the various county Juvenile Courts, with a support order on the County Commissioners under the terms of an act of General Assembly, approved by Gov. Stuart May 31, 1907, entitled "an act to provide for the payment of the costs and expenses of indigent and dependent children in conveying them to, and while in, the home in which they may be placed." To "establish and maintain for the public a bureau of information concerning destitute children and child-caring institutions," and to "acquire and diffuse intelligent views on all subjects related to this branch of charity," are included among the objects of the Children's Aid Society in its first annual report in 1883. The society is prepared to give advice and information to inquirers in regard to the need and value of various kinds of child-helping work insofar as this can be ascertained by the means at its command.

The inspection of the work of the Children's Aid Society and other child-caring agencies by the State Board of Public Charities is provided for by an act of General Assembly, approved by Gov. Pennypacker March 5, 1903, entitled "an act relating to institutions, associations, and societies having the care of delinquent, neglected, or dependent children." Under the terms of this act organizations like the Children's Aid Society are "subject to the same visitation, inspection, and supervision by the Board of Public Charities as the public charitable institutions of this State."

The Children's Aid Society is also subject to the supervision and inspection of boards of visitation appointed by the Court of Common Pleas in each county from which it has received children "under the provisions of the laws of this Commonwealth." An act of the General Assembly, approved January 26, 1903, by Gov. Pennypacker, entitled "an act providing for the appointment of boards of visitation for institutions, societies, and associations caring for dependent, neglected, and delinquent children," authorizes the Court of Common Pleas in each county to appoint such "boards of visitation, consisting of six or more reputable citizens to serve without compensation, but to receive from the county from which they shall be appointed payment of their actual and necessary expenses, subject to the approval of the Board of County Commissioners."

These acts afford an effective means by which the Board of Public Charities and the Judges of the Juvenile Courts can secure information as to the work, the methods, and the results of the treatment given to children committed for care to various agencies.

Since the Children's Aid Society was established in Philadelphia in 1882 the movement has extended throughout the entire State. The Children's Aid Society of Westrn Pennsylvania was incorporated in 1889 and includes twenty-two counties in the western part of the State, having headquarters in Pittsburg. The main office of the Children's Aid Society of Pennsylvania is in Philadelphia, and its territory includes most of the counties in eastern and central Pennsylvania. There are also a number of county societies having their own headquarters, but co-operating or affiliated with either the Pittsburg or Philadelphia offices, according to location. There are a number of independent Children's Aid Societies doing excellent work, such as Chester and Franklin counties. The Delaware County Society has its own charter and by-laws, but has recently voted to affiliate itself with the State Society. There are also independent charities in Montgomery and Bucks County, but the Juvenile Court of Montgomery County commits many of its children direct to the State Society. In Lycoming County there is a very active and vigorous Children's Aid Society, which operates as a branch of the State Society. In other counties in the eastern district of the State, notably Lancaster, Berks, Philadelphia, Lebanon, Tioga, Luzerne, Carbon, Northampton, Montour, Susquehanna, and Bradford, the State Society receives children from the Directors of the Poor. The Juniata Valley Children's Aid Society co-operates with the State Society and receives children direct from the almshouse or Juvenile Court authorities. In Lehigh County the Poor Board has placed a number of children in the care of the County Committee of the State Society. These combined Children's Aid Societies have under their care and supervision in family homes throughout the State over 3,000 children, thus being not only the largest placing-out agency in Pennsylvania, but one of the largest in the United States. Inquiries, calls for speakers at public meetings in the interest of this work for children, and requests for conferences with county committees, Directors of the Poor, and Juvenile Court officials, indicate that there is a widespread interest throughout the State in the work of the Children's Aid Society.

In conclusion, I wish to take this opportunity on behalf of all these Children's Aid Societies in eastern, central, and western Pennsylvania to thank all the Directors of the Poor and other public officials who have co-operated in this great work of helping homeless and neglected children to become self-supporting men and women.

Col. Gould, Erie: Out of many good suggestions that Mr. Sollenberger has made I think I should call the attention of the Directors here to their power in relation to delinquent children that come before the Juvenile Court.

The law creating that court did something that many Directors do not understand the power that they have—that is, the power to compel the County Commissioners to provide a detention home to put the children in that are to be brought before the Juvenile Court. If you will get a body of large-hearted, energetic men and women in your community to organize a Juvenile Court Association and have them take the necessary steps to compel the County Commissioners to provide such a home you will find it a splendid thing to do. Some of the counties thought they could set off a portion of the county jail for the purpose, but the courts have decided that is not a proper place. A child who is to be brought before the court is on his good behavior, and, with a good man and woman having charge of the detention home you will find them on their best behavior until they are brought into court. In Erie County we also have what is called the Elmwood Home, where boys are sent by the court. You can't drive those boys away, they like it so well. We are proud of it and of the work that is being done there.

In the absence of Oliver W. Bohler, of Philadelphia, Superintendent of Blockley Almshouse, L. C. Colborn here read the following paper on "Great Events." The paper was received with applause:

PAPER BY MR. BOHLER.

Mr. Chairman, Ladies, and Gentlemen.

I do not see why I should address this Convention, as there are among you so many more able and ready of speech than myself, except from a sense of duty, inspired by the words of your honorable Secretary, in his circular to me, to wit: "As a penalty for doing nothing, you are on the program for an address," and assigning me as a subject "Great Events." My impression at first was that the punishment was rather severe—in fact, not commensurate with the degree of the crime. After much uneasiness of mind, I decided to forward my judge and executioner a declination of submission. Prolonged reflection, however, softened my determination to evade service; so much so that I gradually felt myself becoming interested, which, added to an eager desire to endeavor to impart information, finally impelled me to accept service and render an accounting. Before proceeding, I desire to assure you, Mr. Chairman, of my appreciation of many of the aphorisms of the time-honored bard, notably his allusion to brevity of speech and discourse. I will, therefore, deal with my subject accordingly and so, perhaps, escape additional penalty for infringing, not only upon your limited time, but also upon the patience of this audience.

My subject matter I would divide into three parts, selecting three events which, in my judgment, appear predominant.

First—Thirty-six years ago the Association of Directors of the Poor of the State of Pennsylvania was formed. What an event! Great? Yes, for in no other State was there such an association. And what has been accomplished? Many laws have been passed pertaining to the care of the poor, the insane, and the dependent children; and, beyond this, the creation of a better understanding among the Directors and their associates—by consultation, comparison of notes, and valuable suggestions—as to the manner and means to be employed in caring for the indigent, erection of buildings, etc. On my first meeting with you I was much surprised to find that questions were asked of one another and answers given and advice where asked, just like one great family. Yet I was not quite satisfied. I was thinking of those fifteen counties of our State which were entirely unrepresented here, that have neither a district nor local almshouse. What an event, indeed, if through the efforts of this association organizations could be effected in these derelict counties.

Second—There has since sprung into existence numerous associations of the same kind in other States, and also a National association has been formed, so that not long ago the President of the United State, the Hon. Theodore Roosevelt, was so impressed with the importance, possibilities, and magnitude of the work that, in order to consult with the people associated in charity work, he called a meeting at the White House, Washington, D. C., to further the care of dependent children. You will surely all agree as to the effect of an event of this character in the furtherance of a very perplexing problem.

Third—In 1881 a little band of women associated themselves in order to find homes for dependent mothers and children other than the almshouse. By hard and diligent work they secured subscriptions to carry out their ideas, and when I first knew of them—this was in the latter part of 1882—they occupied a small room on Arch street in the city of Philadelphia. A little, dark-eyed woman represented them, under the title of Actuary. I called upon her and asked whether, if I had an application for the admission to the Philadelphia Almshouse of children, which I felt should not bear the stigma of the almshouse, whether she would assist me in preventing their admission. She answered yes, and from that time on we worked together successfully and harmoniously. I allude to the Children's Aid Society. Shortly after their work commenced a charter was procured, and the society prospered. Then an association was formed in Pittsburg and the surrounding cities and towns, and following this in regular order in other cities and towns in this State; then to the cities and towns of other States, until now the Children's Aid Society and its great work are known all over the United States. I feel certain that you will not disagree when I classify the formation of this organization as among the great events that have taken place in the charitable field.

That I have not done justice to the subject allotted me, I fully realize; but, enthused with a desire of being agreeable to this assemblage and my wish to retain the confidence of your honorable Secretary, I yielded to these tempting influences, and so bow in submission while praying for merciful consideration.

Mr. Colborn: Two years ago, at West Chester, the committee asked Mr. Roosevelt to address the Convention, and he took the time to write out a part of the address he had given at this meeting in Washington that has been referred to and sent it to us. For years we have been trying to get the Governor of Pennsylvania to meet with us and take part in our proceedings, but there is always something to prevent, and perhaps it is not always a "Great Event."

Shall I tell you who this "little, dark-eyed woman" was? It was Mrs. Punchen. She wended her way over the hills to Somerset and was the first woman to attend this Convention. She presented a resolution before the Convention that was sent before the Legislature and the result was the taking of children under the age of sixteen years out of the almshouses.

Under the head of "Discussion on Desirability of Uniform Laws Governing and Regulating the Charities of the State," Mr. D. A. Mackin, of Luzerne, read the following interesting paper, which was received with applause:

ADDRESS OF MR. MACKIN.

The Desirability of Uniform Laws Governing and Regulating the Charities of Pennsylvania.

After giving the foregoing subject the most careful consideration, it must be emphatically concede that uniformity is the one particular requisite most needed in the poor laws of this great Commonwealth.

I am somewhat loath to enter a field of discussion wherein our legal lights are so well equipped to shine, but since the subject has also been assigned to a lay member of the Convention, I trust all the attorneys, as well as the laymen, from the various districts will give us the benefit of their training and experience with legislation governing the charities of Pennsylvania.

Perhapes the greatest difficulty to be met with in endeavoring to bring about uniform legislation is the fact that the interests and needs of the various poor districts are not identical, and measures that would be advantageous to the county wherein agricultural pursuits predominate might prove not only valueless, but positively injurious, to the large mining and manufacturing communities.

After more than ten years of personal experience in the management of an almshouse, I am forced to the conclusion that there is need for a complete revolution in the charity-governing laws of this State. In fact, it seems to me that a careful revision of existing laws by capable and experienced persons would be of incalculable benefit to all concerned.

While it is my desire to discuss this question only in a general way, yet in order to bring out what, in my opinion, constitute some of the weak points in our present system I find it advisable to refer to my experience in the district and in connection with the institution of which I have charge.

During the year ending September 30, 1910, there was admitted to the almshouse of the Central Poor District of Luzerne County 290 men, seventy-three women, and forty-three children, making a total of 406 admissions. In connection with the number of admissions mentioned an analysis of some of the causes, as having some bearing on the subject under discussion, may be of interest.

It is a well-known fact that many men are admitted during the fall months who might be termed "regulars"—in other words, men who for years, some as many as twenty, have been wintering in our institution. Some of these men, after treatment for a week or two, are perfectly capable of doing manual labor and should be self-supporting; nevertheless, under the existing laws, they are permitted to take advantage of the comforts of the almshouses during the entire winter, when it is difficult to provide suitable employment owing to the general cessation of outdoor work. It is customary for the majority of this class to leave early in the spring, at a time when they might, by their labor, make some compensation to the poor district for the expense incurred in their maintenance during the winter months.

In dwelling on this subject I do not wish it to be inferred that all men admitted during the autumn come under this category. We have in our institution men suffering from miner's asthma, rheumatism, and other ailments peculiar to the coal regions, who, during the spring and summer months are able to perform light outdoor work and earn a salary, which, though small, renders them self-supporting for the time being.

Another class which contributes largely to the almshouse population is the deserted wife and children. At times poor districts are obliged to care for whole families, while the husband and father roams about the country enjoying immunity from punishment.

The poor laws of this Commonwealth thoughtfully provide that no child between the ages of two and sixteen years shall be allowed to remain in an almshouse for more than sixty days. Undoubtedly the gentleman who framed this law had in mind the fact that the atmosphere of an almshouse is not the most desirable place in which to rear children of tender years. In the light of personal experience, I would go still further and say that at times the associations and conditions are such that more harm may be done in sixty days than a lifetime may undo. Habits may be formed and impressions gained that may have a far-reaching effect in influencing the entire future of the child. Indeed, I feel disposed to say that one day, or part of a day, is too long for children from two to sixteen years to be held in an institution of this class.

It would seem that by a concerted effort, aided by necessary legislation on the part of the various poor districts, in conjunction with the police authorities, something could be done to lessen this evil. A system might be instituted whereby it would be possible to trace such deserting husbands and force them to provide for their families. Those who have given this subject even the most casual study realize that a short term of imprisonment does not solve the question, but possibly if the State would provide workhouses where such deserting and non-supporting husbands could be put to work and the proceeds of their labor used for the support of their families, the condition might be improved. In the matter of the discharge of inmates it must be remembered that under our poor laws, except in the case of regularly committed vagrants, the Superintendent is not permitted to exercise his own discretion. Since a person can only become a pauper voluntarily, it follows, necessarily, that we have no right to detain them when they express a desire to leave.

In the foregoing I have endeavored to point out some of the difficulties we meet with in our district, and I am in doubt as to whether I have held very consistently to the subject. However, if by the preceding I succeed in bringing about discussion that will lead to a concentrated effort on the part of those interested, thereby effecting some reforms that will assist in bettering conditions for the weaker ones who come under our charge, I will feel amply repaid.

The Hon. Amos W. Butler, of Indianapolis, Secretary of the Board of State Charities, addressed the Convention as follows on the subject, "The Child Problem":

ADDRESS OF MR. BUTLER.

My Friends: I shall speak on this subject from a little different viewpoint from that usually taken. Possibly there are not many who have had the opportunity of looking at this subject from the standpoint from which I am going to speak this morning. I was introduced once by a noted charity student who said, measured by the number of prisons and jails he and I had been in, we were perhaps the worst men in the United States. I shall speak from the viewpoint of one who has studied prisons and prisoners.

I stood on one occasion in the dining room of a great reformatory. As I saw the men march in and take their places at the tables I realized that all the prisoners were in uniform, and that all the officers were dressed in uniform, and that I was the only one in all that great company who had on citizen's clothes. I realized then as never before what it was to be one among a thousand. As I stood there watching that company of men, a man came in the door and almost touched me before I realized he was there. When I glanced at him I saw it was the President of the Board of Trustees of that institution. He has a deep interest in every one of those persons, and his eyes became moist as he said, "Poor fellows, poor fellows, it is not altogether their fault; it is mostly society's fault." Who is "society?" Aren't you and I members of it? Have we been faultless, or are we, by any act of omission or commission, responsible for the fall of any one of these boys?

One day I visited a house of refuge, an industrial school for boys. I was met at the station by a little fellow dressed in blue, who came with a buggy and drove me to the school. I said to him: "How old are you?" and he replied: "I am twelve." "How did you happen to come here," I inquired. He said: "It is this way: I got so I wouldn't mind my dad, or go to school; I played hookey and the Truant Officer got after me and the Juvenile Court sent me here." "How long are you going to stay?" was asked. He said: "If I behave myself I will be out in another month." "Then you will go back and play hookey again, and be returned to this school," was suggested. "Not on your life," he said, "when I get home I will have sense enough to mind my dad." (Applause).

I have observed in going over the statistics of a reformatory that fifty-seven per cent of the young men have never attended Sunday School, and only one in 500 had been a member of the Young Men's Christian Association. Sometime ago I visited a State prison, arriving there about 8 o'clock in the evening. School was in session and I went to it. This prison received life prisoners and men over thirty years of age. There were 125 men in the schoolroom, being taught by officers and by some of the prisoners. The Chaplain was the Superintendent of the school. I asked a teacher whether he had any new pupils, and he said: "All the men in that row are new men." I stepped up to a man and put my hand on his shoulder, and I thought he would jump out of his seat. I asked his name and his age. He said he was fifty-two years old and had never had the opportunity to receive an education. I spoke to another man and he told me he was sixty. As I came to the third man I realized that he was an old man, and when I asked his age he told me he was seventy-two years old. He said he was born before the day of free schools and lived in a remote part of the State; that his father was poor and he never had the opportunity for an education. There were those three old men, with 120 others, learning their first lessons in the primary department of a prison school.

One evening about the same time I sat in the office of a reformatory talking to the clerk when the door opened and I looked up to see the face of a well-known Sheriff appear at the wicket. By his side stood a young man. I noticed that around the Sheriff's left wrist was an iron handcuff and around the right wrist of the young man was an iron handcuff and a chain connected one with the other. I saw the commitment handed by the Sheriff to the clerk which he receipted and ordered the prisoner delivered to the turnkey. As Sheriff and prisoner walked back through the hall the great wicket door opened and the cuffs were unclasped and fell from the wrist of the young man and off the Sheriff; the latter put the chain in his pocket and bade the young man goodbye. He stepped inside of that door and it closed. Later I learned his story. He told me he grew up on a farm in an agricultural county; his father was a man who made a good living, but hadn't control of his children. The boy got into idle habits and didn't want to go to school. He loafed at the cross-roads store (and I know of no place any worse). In time there was a burglary; that store was robbed. It wasn't long until there were whisperings, and a little later this boy was arrested, charged with burglary, tried and found guilty, and, being under thirty years, was sentenced to an indeterminate term of not less than two nor more than fourteen years in the reformatory.

Now, under that system the jury simply finds a man guilty; the law specifies the sentence and the Judge simply says: "You have been found guilty by the jury; you are sentenced according to the law." And he is committed to the institution to be kept as long as is necessary, in the judgment of the trustees of the institution, between the minimum and maximum limits of the sentence.

At first he thought he would run the institution; but after a few weeks the learned that the State had provided men who drew salaries to run the place and that his services in that direction were not nedeed; that all he had to do was to learn the rules and follow them. He was put in the foundry to learn the trade of molder and at the end of about two and a half years was released, on parole, and given a chance to go outside to see if he could keep the law. A place was found for him as a molder at $3.50 a day. I suppose that was the first work that young man had ever done. He had to make monthly reports of how he worked, and how he spent his time and money, all of which had to be certified to by his employer. The last I knew of him he was making a good record.

Another thing that interested me, in studying these men in the reformatories: About fifteen per cent of them can neither read nor write; fifty per cent had not reached the fourth grade in the public schools, and only five per cent had reached the High School. Sixty-five out of every hundred come from broken homes, where one or both parents are dead or there has been a separation or divorce, or one or both parents is somewhere in confinement Eighty-five per cent of them know no trade, and in the busiest times we have had in the last ten years fifty per cent were unemployed when they committed the crime for which they were arrested.

According to figures read last night by Mr. Weller, there are more than $8,000,000 spent each year for the care of the public charges of this State. Two hundred and eighty-four thousand persons on the average are supported in whole or in part at public expense, and 2,000,-000 persons each year go in and out of institutions you are maintaining.

We have to care for the insane, the fleeble-minded, and the epileptics, and to take care of those who are convicted of offenses against the law. The burden is on us, and we can no more take it off than we can take off our heads. But there is something we can do; we can know the causes of these things. We can know why they exist. We can learn how much of this misery and pauperism and crime can be prevented. (Applause). That is the problem before every such gathering of intelligent men and women as this.

Naturally our thought at once recurs to the fact that of these 284,000 in your institutions supported at public expense, or the 2,000,000 that come out each year, everyone of them was at one time a child. Where did the influence enter their lives that made them public charges, and was there any way to prevent it?

The question of prevention, then, is one that deals largely with children. If we are going to get at the root of this problem it must be by the intelligent work we do for the children. If you have observed what I have stated you have noted that there are cetrain things lacking in these young men who are wards of the State and who are convicted and sentenced for violations of the law. The first and greatest lack is a lack of home training. (Applause). The second great need is the lack of church training. (Applause). When fifty-seven per cent testify that they never attended Sunday School it means much. The third great lack is the lack of school training, and the fourth great lack is the lack of habits of industry. I used to write on my copybook, following my old German teacher, "Satan finds some mischief still for idle hands to do." And this is as true now as it ever was. "An idle brain is the devil's workshop." In some of our States very intelligent study has been given to many of these problems, and as a result there are institutions and agencies for dealing with many of the conditions to which I have referred. I may refer briefly to some of the enactments in some of the States made possible through a study of the conditions and the proper application of the means of prevention. One of the great factors in preventive work is the compulsory education law. When you understand that in my own State 25,000 children are brought into the public schools every year through the efforts of the truant officers it shows good results from his law.

The next step is the question of the care of dependent children; those children that are absolutely dependent on someone else; and the next is the care of neglected children; and the next is the care of delinquent children. In some of the States there have been defined by law the truant child, the dependent child, the neglected child, and the delinquent child. There are also laws providing for the care and custody of such children, and in addition to that there are laws providing for the punishment of anyone who contributes to the dependency, neglect, or delinqnency of a child. Those laws have proven to be very wholesome. Further than that, the child-labor law in many of the States is becoming much more perfect than formerly. That is aiding in the regulation of the working of children, and of mothers of children, in the factories and shops.

The system of caring for dependent children varies greatly in different States. As indicated last night, Massachusetts led the way in establishing a State orphanage. They have closed that and now place a large part of such children in private families. Michigan established a State orphanage more than thirty years ago, and that was followed by other Western States. They are well satisfied with the system, and say in their States it meets the needs. Pennsylvania started on the system of county orphanages either maintained by the county or local orphanages that were subsidized by the State. In my own State we began that system. In 1881 the Legislature of my State provided for the establishment of local orphanages. There was a strong sentiment in the northern part of the State against that, and in favor of the Michigan plan; and the drift of sentiment in my State is in that direction now. We found that one of our greatest difficulties was the lack of definite authority for making children public wards. There were a dozen ways of doing that, and we finally found that the State was caring for many children for whom the parents and relatives ought to care. In one county there was an orphans' home that contained fifty-two children. There was a great deal of complaint from people who lived in the locality. Our office received a request one day from the officers to send them a set of plans for an orphans' home. I went to see them and told them there was no need of it. We said to them your county ought not to support more than eight or ten children and why do you want to spend all this money, amounting to $30,000. They took the matter up and the result was by the middle of the next week we were asked to find homes for the children. Some of the children had been in the institution eight or ten years. It is hard to find homes for such children, but we took out ten of the children in the next thirty days, and the papers published that fact. At the end of sixty days the number of children had been reduced to thirty-two, and it kept going down, to ten, and eight, and then to two, and then the institution was closed. (Applause). This condition existed all over the State, and we came to the conclusion that it was time that someone with authority had the right to inquire whether or not a child should be the ward of the State. No child in our State now can be made a public ward except on the order of the Judge of the Juvenile Court. You will be surprised to learn how many people, when they find their children are going to be made public wards, do not want that done and find they are able to take care of them themselves. We direct the township overseer of the poor never to break up a family, if it is a fit place for the children; to hold them together, and only as a last resort to take the child away.

Now, a neglected child is one that is in an unfit or immoral or vicious home. We have a statute providing for a County Board of Children's Guardians. The Court may declare a child a ward of the State and place it in the hands of that board as a ward. The Juvenile Court handles the delinquent cases, too. There is another law in use in certain States, known as the licensing law. Two years ago some of our philanthropic agencies became interested in the fact that many children were being made public wards in our county, many of them coming from other counties, and some from other States. They made an investigation, and the result was that in our county, containing less than a third of a million people, there were found eighteen lying-in homes and maternity hospitals, twenty-eight foundling asylums, children's homes, and baby farms, and thirty-four institutions and agencies answered an advertisement to board babies. We found that children were raffled off in saloons; that they had been offered for sale for from $1.00 to $5.00 each; that they had been doped, poisoned, mistreated, underfed, and neglected, and many of them had been put in private families and had died from previous neglect. The array of evidence presented was startling, and it led to a demand from our people that a law should be passed providing some form of licensing such agencies. Now every maternity hospital, lying-in home, foundling asylum, orphans' asylum, children's home, or any other kind of a child-caring agency, whether public or private, has to have an annual written license from the Board of State Charities. The result of this was that of the seventy in my own county fourteen applied for a license and seven licenses were granted; the other sixty-three went out of business; and everyone of the institutions that now exist comes up to the standard. The reputable institutions believe in the law and cheerfully conform to it. They have to make a daily report to our office and we have an inspector making the rounds all the time, to see that they are in every way complying with the law. It is said that the infant mortality in such institutions in that county has been reduced one-half, and we are not troubled now with many persons coming from other counties and States and the children being left public wards. It is one of the best laws we have had in years. It is a protection to the public and to the women and children.

These various things to which I have referred are simply tools that are put into our hands. We are builders; in order to build we have to have tools, and the Legislature has given us such in these acts, that form the skeleton of a children's code. If we do not use these tools we will not be very efficient. If we study them and make them a part of us we will know where and how to apply them. When a person appeals to us to know what can be done in a certain case we will know what to do. These tools are yours and mine.

Ordinarily when a person makes a speech on charity he is expected to ask for a collection. (Laughter). I am not going to ask you for a collection; but I am going to ask you to think about these matters and learn how the laws are applied in your own communities. I am going to ask you not to give me money, but to give this subject a little of your time and thought and effort. To give something of yourselves.

"He that giveth himself with his gift helps three—himself, his hungering neighbor, and Me."

Applause.

At the close of his paper Mr. Butler referred to the National Conference of Charities to be held in Boston next June, and urged the members to attend if possible.

Mr. Smith (Chester): We pride ourselves in Pennsylvania as being one of the first States of the Union, but after listening to this address I am impressed with the deficiency of some of our laws for the care of our children. Let us take this message home with us. "In union there is strength," and I think much good will come out of this able address, if we will go to work and not allow our Legislature to rest until they have given us better laws for the care of our children.

Applause.

Mrs. Helen M. Holloway, of Bloomsburg, Pa., here read the following paper, "Probation Work Among Children," which was received with applause:

ADDRESS OF MRS. HOLLOWAY.

"Probation Work Among Children."

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen.

The probation system, adopted at first in Massachusetts with reference to first offenders, has been widely extended over our country since the organization of children's courts.

Massachusetts discovered a good many years ago that it was better to return first offenders to society as soon as possible after conviction—rather than shut them up behind prison bars. The criminal was sentenced to prison for a given number of years, but after he had been in jail a brief period, if his conduct was good, he was placed on probation—that is, he was permitted to return to society and become a wage-earner. But he was under the supervision of the prison officials until the expiration of his sentence. Thus, it was found, that many first offenders could be placed on their good behavior and kept under the supervision of a probation officer, rather than held behind prison bars, and that greater good came to the prisoner, with less cost to the State.

With a rapid development of children's courts in the United States the probation system has been widely adopted and the probation officer has become a recognized factor in the care and training of juvenile offenders.

Instead of placing juvenile dependents and juvenile delinquents in homes for orphans and reform schools, it is now recognized that while the custodial care of some children is needed, that for the majority of such children what is needed is a home. For the average child a home is the best place in which to grow up. And children who have no homes, or whose homes are not suitable for their proper care and training—such children must have homes provided for them. This is the work of the probation officer—to seek homes for those children who have no homes, or for those children whose parents no longer provide suitable homes for them.

But the probation officer must do more than find homes for such children. She must see that such children are properly treated and cared for after homes have been provided. There must be constant supervision of all children placed on probation, and frequent visits to families where such children are placed. It is not merely that such children be provided with places to live. They must be placed where constant oversight is exercised. Families will sometimes agree to take a dependent or a delinquent child simply because they want a servant in the house. The good of the child, his moral development and intellectual training, are little thought about. Hence, probation officers should see to it that families with whom such children are placed do not abuse their privileges. Only the constant supervision of the probation officer will prevent such abuses.

Another important duty of the probation officer should be to secure homes by way of adoption of such children. Families must be found who will take the children, not merely because they are paid so much per week or per month, but because they want to give the orphaned, abandoned, and delinquent child their own name and bring him up as their own child.

The probation officer also becomes a necessary part of the children's court, where such court actually exists, and when there is no special children's court, of the general local criminal court. Thus the probation officer becomes an investigator of the home conditions and past history of such children as have broken away from the restraints of the law.

Before a child is tried there should be a searching examination into his physical and mental defects, the family history, and the conditions that surround the child. Such information is necessary before proper judicial action can be taken. Thus, the probation officer becomes an investigator and an adviser to the Court. Most Judges can know very little about the conditions that may have produced the crime for which the child has been brought before the Court.

The probation officer also must represent in a measure the power and authority of the State. But as Judge Mack, of the Children's Court of Chicago, once said: "The probation officer must represent that authority in a far larger measure of love. The probation officer must not be the jail-guard type, but of the educated, philanthropic worker type—not all mind and not all heart, but a wise mingling of the two. We must train up a generation of probation officers, if we are to do our work effectively; because unless probation be real, unless probation accomplishes the results of keeping the child from going wrong, unless probation be kept from getting into a rut, the whole system of children's courts will be discredited."

Mr. Weller, of Pittsburg, was here called for and spoke as follows:

It has been said that false teeth are all right in their place. I am afraid even a good speech from me might not be in place after so long a program and so many good things. Someone has recently said that the greatest conquest ever attained by Napoleon Bonaparte was when Theodore Roosevelt stood "silent" before his tomb. (Laughter).

If I live up to my title as a charity worker I ought to be entirely silent.

It is true we all have these problems we have been discussing. First of all is the problem of outdoor relief. That is if we are watching the relief problems we will have brought up in their early stages many of the problems that center about the feeble-minded and the insane, because the problems of outdoor relief have to do with the families who are weak. The story of such a family is one that we will call the family of Henry Meyer, because that is not his name. He has five small children and he is somewhat addicted to drink and somewhat addicted to desertion. He was reported last year to the Associated Charities of Pittsburg and we found that the family had been receiving relief for some years, and the first thing we noted was that all these agencies that they had been receiving aid from took it for granted that Henry was no good. They had neglected to see him. I would like to say that where there is a man in a family it is the duty of the relief-giving agency to see that man—if they have to camp out on the doorstep for hours. The visitor of the Associated Charities did camp out until she saw him. He sat there with one of the children on his knee. The home was pretty clean. There were some old pieces of furniture in the home, and quite a tone about the home. This able-bodied man stood there and the visitor spoke with sympathy when she remarked that the children looked thin and ill-fed. He said: "Yes, they don't get enough to eat," and he insinuated that it was up to the visitor to see that they did get something to eat. He experienced a distinct shock when the visitor suggested to him that it was his business to see that the children got something to eat.

We began the treatment of that relief problem with this idea: Here is a man under thirty; it is his job to take care of his family. We will give him all kinds of assistance, but we will be mighty careful not to provide for his family, as it is his business.

Now, people will say: "But you can't let the children suffer." I take it there were two ways to prevent their suffering; one was to take adequate responsibility to take care of the children; the other alternative was so to strengthen the Meyer father and mother that they would provide for their children. When the church people said, "You cannot let the children suffer" did they mean they would do one of these things? No; they meant they would give $2 relief in January and another $2 in March or April. The children of such a family are bound to suffer unless you get to work and have them entirely under your care; or set yourselves determinedly to work to build up strength and ability on the part of those whose duty it is to care for the children. We were very careful not to increase their probability of suffering by further weakening the responsibility that Henry felt. We got him to take the drink cure. We got him a job. He did splendidly for six months and then he took the first drink and that led him to leave his wagon at the roadside and to disappear. Here were the five children, and the wife came and said: "Won't you put the children in an institution and let me get a job?"

From my experience a large part of the child problem in our community comes from just such families.

Now, we believe the relief policy in that case meant to go slow. We believe that a proper relief policy looks to conserving all the possibilities of self-help and of family responsibility. Although it was hard to do it we left that woman without relief for a while. She was assisted by a neighbor who was himself a poor man. We often went to see the family, but we were afraid to step in too quickly to take care of the children. We knew that somewhere, sooner or later the man would be affected by our treatment of the case. We went to see the relatives of the family—this husband's brothers and sisters and the wife's relatives—and we put up to them the family problem. The man came back. We didn't bring him before the Court. We spent time getting him a job again. He agreed to have his pay drawn by his wife, under our supervision, and he seems now to be making good. (Applause).

So the suggestion I would make is that the relief policy, public or private, is absolutely dangerous unless it includes a determined effort to consider character questions; to give strength as well as material aid. Any relief policy which had dealt with the Meyer family without an endeavor to cure his habit of drink and to win him from his habit of desertion would have been liable to do more harm than good, because the need of that family was based upon those two elements of weakness, and a few dollars given occasionally without an effort to cure that weakness would probably have increased that weakness.

So the whole modern movement is based on these fundamentals: It believes you cannot deal with the relief problem safely unless there be competent personal service, and, secondly, co-operation. By "competent personal service" I mean that a competent man or woman must go to each family, as the problem arises, and must study every possibility within the family situation; must have as the ideal the development of self-help where it is possible, the keeping together of the family—the bringing in of the family group—some such a view as you have seen in some institutions where a girl is learning sewing; you have seen a piece torn from a tablecloth and she takes it and weaves the torn shreds back into the fabric until you can hardly tell where it was torn out.

In the second place, co-operation: You and I have to deal with a tremendous social force. In Pittsburg we spend about $2,000,000 annually for charitable work. You know if you strike a blow this way (indicates) with your fingers you won't harm yourself. You know you want to unite your fingers if you desire to strike a blow. If you strike at the problem of poverty with scattered fingers no one is injured much, but the family. We must deal a blow with united forces; so we must work for a united policy on this question.

The fundamental doctrine is that we help people in proportion as we stimulate or increase their activity. My muscle developes as I use it. We help people only in proportion as we get them to do something, or to have their activity enlarged. We are going to help the Meyer family. How? Not by doing things for them, but by patiently and sympathetically developing their own faculties; lifting up their ideals; helping in every feature of the home life to make it better. In our institutions we are to hold that ideal before us; that we are to bring in occupation for these people, even for the incurable insane—not because it is more profitable for the institution, but because we know we can help these charges of ours only as we understand their fragments of active powers and develop them.

So the relief policy of any community should, it seems to me, be the subject of very earnest thought and careful development; and unless we can base it on the principle of competent personal service and co-operation and self-help we shall find that public relief better be eliminated; that unless the relief policy does gather up some of these standards it is likely to do in this country as it has in some other countries—more harm than good.

I thank you for your patience.

Applause.

Upon motion, the Convention was here adjourned until 2 p. m.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention was called to order at 2 p. m. by President Wilson.

Mr. D. A. Mackin (Luzerne): Under the head of "Miscellaneous Business" I would like the Convention to suggest to the Program Committee a way to have sectional meetings; that we endeavor to have the people interested in one branch of the work one-half day, instead of having the program so mixed as it is.

Mr. Colborn: In answer to the circular that was sent out on program I did not receive a single suggestion from anybody. I had in mind just what Mr. Mackin suggests. I would like the arrangement of sectional meetings. I have been making up the programs for fifteen years and am very glad to have suggestions of this kind.

Mr. Mackin: I would suggest that at each sectional meeting we have at least one person who is an expert on the particular subject for that meeting.

Mr. Charles Snyder, of Philadelphia, Chairman of the Committee on Next Place of Meeting, here announced that the committee had selected Indiana, Indiana County, as the next place of meeting, and presented the report.

Upon motion, the report of the committee was adopted.

Mr. Osche, Chairman of the Auditing Committee, presented the report of that committee, as follows:

THE TREASURER'S ACCOUNT.

Balance in the hands of the Treasurer for the year ending this 11th day of October, 1910	$244.62

We, the undersigned committee, appointed to audit the account of the Treasurer for the year ending 11th October, 1910, respectfully report that we have performed that duty and find the same to be correct and true as stated. Balance in Treasurer's hands at last meeting, $109.43; that the Treasurer has collected during the year the sum of $695, making a total received by the Treasurer of $804.43, and that the Treasurer has expended and paid out as per his receipts the sum of $559.81, leaving a balance in the hands of the Treasurer of $244.62. The Association is to be congratulated on its good financial standing, and its thanks are due the Treasurer for his financiering the Association so well.

We further recommend that the same assessments be levied as were levied the past year.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

H. W. OSCHE,
R. C. BUCHANAN,
J. A. GRAY,
Auditing Committee.

The report was read by Mr. Osche, and upon motion, was adopted.

Upon motion of Mr. Colborn a recess was here taken for the purpose of having a picture of the delegates and others present taken, and the members assembled in front of the Postoffice building, where a picture was taken to be used as a frontispiece for the report.

Upon reassembling the Convention was favored with music by the young ladies.

Dr. William J. Steward, Superintendent of the Hospital for the Insane, Lancaster, read a paper entitled, "The Insane, County Care, Etc." The paper, which was received with applause, follows:

PAPER BY DR. STEWARD.

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen.

That the State and county must provide adequately and well for all of the insane within its borders is not now denied by those possessed of the humanitarian spirit.

Daniel Defoe more than 200 years ago regarded the care of this class of individuals as a "rent charge upon the whole community," and at a comparatively recent date Horace Mann enunciated the principle that the dependent insane are wards of the State.

To care for the dependent, to relieve the needy, to protect and prolong human life, to safeguard public health, is a social obligation. Year by year this Convention has assembled in various quarters of this great Commonwealth to consider, to discuss, these problems, the greatest problems of human life. Everywhere—whether it be in hospital, almshouse, factory, school, or what not—man is becoming more and more the "greatest study of mankind." Thus are we confronted with a difficult and many-sided problem, and if an adequate and satisfactory solution be not found, degeneracy will become the terminal history of the race. There is no escape from the responsibility that devolves upon us as sociological workers, and equally no escape from the fact that we must give a careful and complete account of our stewardship, whether we have been true to the trust whereunto we have been called.

There is no more pitiable class of human beings than those who are bereft of their reason, and no form of human affliction so unfortunate as mental alienation. Let us revert briefly to the history of public care of the insane.

In the years that are gone this affliction has been characterized by such terms as "demon," "lunatic," and "witch." In the ancient ages the history of mental diseases is limited to allusions in the Old Testament and works of poetry.

Homer and Sophocles portray the woes of the poor unfortunate. Listen to the words of Hippocrates, the great father of medicine: "Men ought to know that from nothing else but the brain come joy, despondency, and lamentation, and by the same organ we become mad and delirious." The Hippocratic theory of mental disease as expressed in the scientific language of to-day is: "The brain is the seat of mental activity, and, like other organs, is obnoxious to the natural causes of disease. Mental diseases arise from abnormalities of the brain."

More than 2,000 years afterwards Burton, in his "Anatomy of Melancholy," says that the insane are bewitched and are capable of producing tempests and dire calamities. What progress in this lapse of 2,000 years?

To read the history of the treatment and care of the insane is to read a history of misery and degradation, the result of man's ignorance and inhumanity to man.

For centuries the fate of the insane remained the same. Though Charles the Great had forbidden the burning of witches, and the noble Wier in 1515 had appealed to the Emperor and the people to spare the blood of these witches, who were only insane or hysterical, yet these voices were without effect, and witch trials and all their attending horrors continued to exist well into the eighteenth century. The unfortunate sick and reason-bereft could not be relegated eternally to the dungeon and direful tortures. There is always some heart a-tune to the relief of suffering, and always some men who, punctuation marks in the text of time, indicate the epochs of human history.

The great Pinel, having applied to Couthon for permission to strike off the shackles from the patients under his charge in the famous Bicetre, was held with suspicion, and, upon inspecting the conditions existing in this great French prison for the insane, Couthon, turning to this great physician, said: "Look here, citizen, art thou insane thyself, that thou wilt unchain such animals?"

But filled with the zeal, as one who loved his fellow-men, he removed the chains that bound fifty-three insane patients, and began a work that makes his record immortal. About the same time public sentiment was aroused in England, and the large-hearted Quaker, William Tuke, founded in 1792 "The York Retreat." Of this retreat, Mr. Samuel Tuke has written, in 1813, "The retreat has been conducted from the beginning upon the principle that the utmost practical degree of gentleness, tenderness, and attention to the comforts and feelings of the patients was, in the first place, due to them as human beings, and in the next place, was infinitely the means of effecting their recovery."

Antedating by nearly a century, the striking service of Pinel and Tuke, as early as 1709, the Society of Friends, at a monthly meeting held in Philadelphia, discussed ways and means for the establishment of a hospital for the sick and insane. Out of this movement grew the Pennsylvania Hospital, in 1751, which had a ward provided for those who were "distempered in mind and deprived of their rational faculties." In addition to this was the establishment in 1813 of the Friends' asylum upon the broad principle "that the insane might see that they were regarded as men and brethren."

The first half of the nineteenth century marks the emancipation period for the insane in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. It marks the beginning of public care, and the beginning of a true public policy concerned chiefly in keeping in human custody of the unfortunate insane individual. Care was the central thought, and little or no attention given to remedial treatment. In the latter half of the nineteenth century the remedial or curative treatment became prominent, and with this came that department of mental science known as psychiatry, and thus psychiatry, after a severe struggle, gained a rightful place among the natural sciences.

With public care came public policy in the placing of the insane in institutions and devolping humanitarian sentiment has built institutions everywhere favorable to the observation of the insane.

The oldest public care for the insane in Pennsylvania was what is known to-day as the "County Care Plan." This antedated the establishment of the State institutions and during which time the insane were collected in poorhouses and suffered much from illusage and neglect.

Dorothea Dix, having inspected the poorhouses in various parts of the State, transmitted to the Legislature a memorial, the result of which was the passage of the act establishing a State hospital. This was the beginning of the State policy of caring for the insane with the establishment of the hospital at Harrisburg. One by one other hospitals were erected—at Danville, Norristown, Warren, Dixmont, and Wernersville, having a population to-day, according to the report of 1909, of 9,280. Two others are in course of construction, one at Rittersville and the other for criminal insane at Fairview, Wayne County. Each will have a capacity of 1,000 beds.

The second form of public policy, existing in the State of Pennsylvania to-day, is that known as "County Care."

In 1896 and 1897, the State hospitals becoming overcrowded, the Committee on Lunacy was confronted with the problem of meeting this condition. Their attention was directed to the system that existed and was in successful operation in the State of Wisconsin, for a period of fifteen years, known as "County Care." In order to inaugurate a similar system in Pennsylvania, and in order to establish a more rational and economical plan of care, the Committee on Lunacy in 1896 drew up a bill, which, being approved by the Board of Public Charities, was presented to the Legislature in 1897. This bill was approved by the Legislature and signed by the Governor, and is known as "An act to provide for the maintenance, care, and treatment of the indigent insane in county and local institutions."

It provided "That any county, municipality, borough, or township of this Commonwealth which now has, or may hereafter, supply, erect, and equip a suitable institution for the maintenance, care, and treatment of its indigent insane, upon plans and specifications, approved in writing by the Board of Public Charities, shall receive from the State treasury the sum of $1.50 per week (now amended to $2.00 per week) for every indigent insane person of such county, municipality, borough, or township so maintained, who has been legally adjudged to be insane and committed to such institution, or who may be transferred from a State hospital for the insane to such local institution; Provided, That the Board of Public Charities shall be satisfied that the quality and equipment of such institution, and the manner of care and treatment therein furnished, is proper and suitable to the class or classes of the indigent insane so maintained, and shall so certify to the Auditor-General before any such payment shall be made."

This is the so-called "County Care Act of 1897," and its main object is to induce counties or other localities to care for some, if not all, of their insane in local institutions, preferably in new, modernly-appointed county hospitals, such as those in Wisconsin.

In the institutions in Pennsylvania now having "County Care," there were not less than 6,171 patients reported on September 30, 1909. The number of insane is increasing each year. This annual increase is enough to fill a good sized hospital. The question naturally presents itself: What provision shall be made? Shall we build more State hospitals, or shall we encourage the counties to make suitable provision for their own patients?

Mr. James E. Heg, before the National Conference of Charities, with reference to the Wisconsin system, states that "more than 2,700 chronic insane are now being care for in the county asylums and fully as well cared for as in any State institution in the country. To have cared for these by the State would have required buildings that would have cost $2,000,000. To have obtained that immense sum from the Legislature would have been almost impossible, and, if possible, would have entailed heavy burdens on the people, already heavily taxed."

The counties not having "County Care" are to-day paying to the State hospitals $1.75 per week and the clothing bill for each patient cared for in the State hospital from that county.

On the contrary, should that county have "County Care," the State will pay $2.00 per week. From this it will be seen that the county really gets $3.75 per week from what it received and what it saves.

The people are paying no more than they would have paid had the insane been cared for in the State institutions.

County Care in Pennsylvania, as viewed by the Committee on Lunacy, to-day is a success. It has been shown that caring for the insane in the local institutions in small numbers has the advantage financially, but this is not the broadest view, I grant, for one to take of this subject. But there are other advantages urged by the advocates of the County Care system, such as nearness to their friends, and that it facilitates the parole to their homes of numbers of chronic insane. County Care offers the largest opportunity for the employment of this benefit of parole, which is of inestimable advantage to the insane, and of benefit to the institution.

In the State institutions for the year of 1909, taking the number of patients treated during the year as the base, there were discharged as restored 3.59 per cent, while under County Care 4.46 per cent. Discharged improved in State hospitals 3.78 per cent, and about 8.64 per cent in the hospitals under County Care, almost twice as great a percentage. Percentages are in the main fallacious and may be twisted to meet any argument, but by way of explanation it has been urged that the big hospitals cannot give the patients the individual care and the best kind of treatment calculated to restore them, as can be given in the home hospitals.

In passing, permit me to mention a class of mental defectives that is engaging the attention of institution workers to-day. It is the opinion that the criminal insane should be cared for in asylums devoted to the care of this class only, and when the hospital is completed at Fairview there will be filled a long-felt want in this Commonwealth. The average criminal, through atavism, direct heredity, or primary degeneration is morally defective and should be segregated.

This County Care as found in Wisconsin, and which was primarily the idea in the establishment of County Care in Pennsylvania, was intended for the harmless, incurable, or chonic class of patients. The acute, curable cases under this system were to be cared for in the State institutions.

Some of our counties have gone beyond the original thought of the act, and have really created and equipped small hospitals for the insane.

While the County Care Act does not limit any locality as to the class of patients it may care for locally, the act does specifically state that suitable institutions for the maintenance, care, and treatment shall be provided, and that the Board of Public Charities shall be satisfied that the quality and equipment of such institutions, and the manner of care and treatment therein furnished, are proper and suitable to the class or classes so maintained.

What constitutes this suitable equipment and proper care? The whole asylum must be elevated to the hospital regime, in imitation, as far as possible, of the general hospital for physical diseases. Every effort should be made for the better hospital treatment of acute cases at all institutions, because insanity is curable in its early or acute stages. Better hospital treatment means better facilities for work, enlargement of medical staff, and the employment of trained nurses. There must be a unifying of authority in a general superintendent, who must be a thoroughly-trained physician. For the best interests of the institution and the patients under its care, the form of management found in some of our institutions for the insane, in which laymen are in supervision, should be hustled into limbo. It would be absurd to take the village blacksmith and elect him master mechanic to build an iron man-of-war in our Navy yards. It is equally absurd to appoint as superintendent a layman, one who has devoted no time to study of psychiarty and the treatment of mental diseases, and with no more conception of hospitals and hospital management than a Hottentot has of the Confession of Faith.

One of the most important problems confronting those in charge of hospitals for the care and treatment of mental diseases, is the securing of the kind and skillful performance of their duties, by the attendants. The troubles and abuses, in the great majority of instances, come from ignorance, and not from wilful neglect or abuse. By securing attendants well adapted for their work and providing them with instruction by means of lectures, recitations, and instruction and drill in the practical work of caring for the sick and the insane, a corps of attendants can be developed, intelligent and efficient, who will greatly further the work of the hospital.

The insane patient is a sick individual, and he requires careful attention and nursing, in order to bring him back to health and usefulness, that he may be returned to his family a useful unit in the community.

For this proper care and suitable equipment the insane must look to the Directors of the Poor of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. In the hands of these officials is the care of the indigent insane, a class of individuals absolutely unable to help themselves. There is no class for whom it is so important to provide proper care and suitable equipment, and it is equally important that those who have charge of this unfortunate class, should be men of character, honor, and honesty.

It is to be hoped that the time is not far distant when the most modern appliances for scientific treatment may be had in every institution. Does the fear of expense operate against our best judgment in these things that would be to the best interests of those who depend upon our institutions for relief? The insane deserve better things and the public have a right to demand it; and there is no enterprise to which the public can give their attention and for which public money can be expended comparable to the care and treatment of the indigent insane.

Mrs. Sarah Cooper, of Avondale, Pa., here read a paper entitled, "The Community of Duty to the Neglected and Dependent Children." Before beginning the reading of the paper Mrs. Cooper said: "It is with great hesitation that I come before you. Every department of this work has been discussed, but as I prepared this paper I will give it to you for what it is worth." Mrs. Cooper was received with applause, and spoke as follows:

ADDRESS OF MRS. COOPER.

The duty of the community to neglected and dependent children seems to the writer to be a very broad one, and conveys more meaning than the casual observer would for a moment realize. All children are dependent upon someone for support and care until they arrive near the age of maturity; but the dependent child, as we understand it, is one who has to depend entirely upon the community for its physical, mental, and moral development. But do we understand that the neglected children are only those who are homeless and depend upon the community for their support and care? To me the neglected child covers a far broader ground than the dependent one. A neglected duty is a failure, through carelessness, to perform something that should have been done; a neglected child, therefore, is one who has failed to receive, through the carelessness of those upon whom its care has been entrusted, any part or portion of its development that would tend toward building a strong, vigorous physical constitution, and a mental and moral training that would aid them in becoming useful citizens of our country. With this definition it will not be necessary for us to direct our attention alone to homes of squalor and poverty to find them, but some of the homes of the rich should also claim our consideration. Is it not true, that in some of the homes of our wealthiest people we find children whom God has given them as a trust surrounded with every luxury that this world can afford; their little bodies bedecked with everything that is costly and beautiful; every desire attended to by servants, whose duty it is to gratify every petty want, while the parents, the father, perhaps, is so deeply engrossed in business that he may add more dollars to his already overflowing bank account, or working up some political scheme that he may become one of the political bosses or grafters of our country, that his children are almost strangers to him and the training of these young minds is left entirely to the mother. And what can we say to her? Do we find her at her post of duty? Or is her mind so absorbed with preparing for and attending so many of the social functions of the day and keeping pace with the latest styles of dress for herself and children that their moral and intellectual training and the building up of strong and noble characters is left entirely to the servants, who are totally unfit to be entrusted to such a care. Under such training and influence these children grow up to be selfish and tyrannical and become leaners rather than lifters in this great work of reform that is appealing more and more every year to the very best that is in each and everyone of us. And still more, should the wealth and luxury that has been showered upon them in childhood be suddenly wrenched from them by some unfortunate circumstances they are totall unfitted to meet life's battles and become subjects for financial help in the neighborhood in which they reside. Such cases as these are not imaginary, but have come directly under the knowledge of the writer. Another result of this parental neglect we see in the alarming increase of applications for divorce among those in high life. These young people whose selfish natures have been nurtured in childhood until ready to bear fruit go out into the world, select companions from entirely selfish motives without any regard for the sacredness of the marriage vow soon grow weary of each other and seek other companionship, and the happiness of the home, one of God's greatest gifts to His people, is wrecked forever and the children grow up to repeat the story. Has the community any duty in regard to these children? Certainly it has; but what shall that duty be and how shall it be accomplished? This is a serious problem, far harder to solve than the duty we owe to the neglected child we pick up from the gutters and highways. These children we gather up and place under our own personal care, under the best environment at our command, for their best development and trust to the future as to the outcome. The community has no such jurisdiction over the class of children above alluded to, neither can we reach them by legislation; but can we not send out a stronger appeal in this age of fast living that parents be more keenly alive to the responsibility of the guardianship of their children, whether it be to the elevation of the soul or the undermining of the moral character by careless neglect. An improvement in these social conditions and a progress toward better citizenship in high life must be made by constant agitation of the subject where this class of people can be reached, either through the church, the school, or through men's and women's societies if they would interest themselves in this work.

The next problem that confronts us is what is our duty to the poor who are not entirely deserted and neglected, but are crowded in tenement houses in our large cities with sanitary arrangements far inferior to the animals entrusted to our care. There are thousands of these homes where the rooms simply open into an air shaft, where not a single ray of cleansing sunlight enters, and lamps are kept burning all day long. In such homes as these thousands of children are huddled together with no possible chance of either physical or mental development. Judge Lindsey, who is the best known Judge of the Juvenile Court in the world, says that in his eyes the child is the Nation and through the child's misery, and misfortune, and tears he learned the social, political, and economic problems of the Nation, and he believes until these are solved there will be no justice for the child or man. It has been truly said that stunted children make stunted citizens, and stunted citizens make a stunted State.

With these truths before us it is certainly the duty of the community to make a stronger plea for better and more sanitary homes for our dependent class of people. Healthy childhood and strong manhood weigh too light in the balance against property. The child labor problem goes hand in hand with the problem of improving these wretched tenement conditions. In these tenement districts child labor flourishes as noisome weeds flourish and grow in foul swamps, and little children, almost babies, are forced into this unnatural struggle for a mere existence. I do not know what the census of 1910 records, but that of 1900 reported that 1,750,178 children, or nearly one in six of the children in the United States over ten years of age and under sixteen, were engaged in gainful occupations. All of these children were presumably sacrificing some of the educational opportunities, and of the golden age of play and many of the normal rights of childhood to the necessity of earning part or the whole of their daily bread. Pennsylvania's child-labor law has been very lax. Although she stands first in mining, second in manufacture, commerce, and population, she stands forty-sixth in the number of child laborers employed, if the States having the fewest be put at the head, and Eastern Pennsylvania stands on a still lower plane. In the nineteen counties east of Harrisburg, where less than fifty per cent of the population reside, out of the 35,000 children employed in the State eighty-five per cent of them work for their bread in this territory. Under these conditions Pennsylvania's part must not be one of boasting, but of reform. She has before her a long and arduous climb, but she has made one step upward from the foot of the ladder by the new labor law that went into effect January 1, 1910. This law provides that children who apply for employment must produce a certificate that they have arrived at the age of fourteen and can read and write intelligently in the English language. Between January 1st and May 1st the compulsory education bureau received 10,919 applications for employment certificates; 735 of these were refused, as they did not come up to the requirements of the law and they had to return to school. This is surely a great improvement over the laws of the past. The providing of parks and playgrounds while of immediate good, offers much to the unborn inhabitants of our cities by helping to conserve strong, healthy bodies and healthy minds. We have the free day school that must take the partially blind, deaf, and crippled, the epileptic and the defective, but do we make sufficient effort to learn the cause and effect a cure if possible to all the ills that flesh is heir to. We must turn the light of science on in order to seek the cause. How much has overcrowding to do with these conditions from which little children suffer? How much has long hours of manual labor for mothers to do with this, and what does pinching poverty contribute to making these crooked, incomplete bodies and warped minds. Of these things we know nothing. The scientists in the Government employ can tell all about the cause and prevention of disease in our stock; how to destroy San Jose scale and prevent the blight from destroying our fruit crops, but when we ask why we have so many children in school who cannot do average work they cannot answer. It is time that the child, at least, shared, with the agricultural, dairy, and fruit interests of the wise men in the employ of the Government. This can be accomplished by the establishment of a children's bureau. This bureau would give its attention to children and we would know something between physical defects and mental deffiiciency, between bad housing, under feeding, and overwork. This bureau could gather data by which we could formulate laws; we could compel parents to provide eyeglasses and dental care; we could compel landlords to provide decent places for their tenents to live, and we could take those whose inability is so marked as to make them incapable of self-support and undesirable as parents, and place them in an environment suitable to their needs. The cost to the State would be great, but the return to the race, in the way of children born with chance for health and success is inestimable. Although women have not yet been allowed the ballot they have had a powerful influence over the improved legislation. The Pennsylvania Federation of Women was of the greatest assistance in the passage of the new labor law, as they were instrumental in sending 10,000 petition postal cards to the Governor and different legislators for a revision of the law. It is not only in appealing for better legislation that the women have come to the front, but they have been and still will be a power toward solving the question: "What is to be done with the forsaken and homeless children thrown entirely upon the community for support?" The chance for these children to become useful citizens is far greater (if Chester County is a sample) than those who profess to have homes under the conditions already alluded to. The Chester County Children's Aid Society has been established over twenty-five years. It is composed entirely of women who are volunteer workers, many of them mothers who, with sympathetic hearts and an inate knowledge of the child's needs, are well qualified for child placing. This band of women take these little outcasts from the age of two years and upward, place them in boarding homes (at the expense of the county) under the best environment possible, until a good Christian free home can be found. See that their clothing is such as will be conducive to their health; require them to be sent regularly to school, and any deficiencies in their physical constitution we aim to help by such treatment as our physician would prescribe. We not only do this, but we visit them in their homes, give them a word of encouragement, show them that we are their friends to whom they can turn in any emergency and look for help in time of need. For it is undoubtedly true that some of the homes that are opened to these outcasts are entirely from selfish motives, with no thought for the future of the child. With the miserable inheritance many of these children have we meet with many discouragements; but when we look around us and see by our care and interest the useful citizens we have raised we feel that our work has been well worth while. Many of our most unpromising boys and girls who have caused us the most trouble and discouragement have grown up to be honest, industrious men and women, and useful citizens in our community. We have no record of any who have gone out from our care becoming inmates of the almshouse or prison. So much for the private Christian home for the care and training of these children. What we need is to have more Christian homes open to these children, where they will not only be taught to be useful in the home, but have a guardianship also that will be toward the development of the best that is in the child. We cannot educate our people to the importance of this great work all at once, but by degrees. It is not the great tides of reform that do so much. We have had them like great torrents that sweep over the land, but it is the gradual dripping of the water that wears away the stone. It is the little we can do, the daily help to elevate in every rank in life to true womanhood and manhood, is what counts in the end.

This paper was much enjoyed by the Convention and the reading was followed by applause.

Following the reading of the paper by Mrs. Cooper the young ladies favored the Convention with music.

The discussion, "The Rights of Directors of the Poor in the Management of Unruly and Incorrigible Inmates," was opened by the Hon. E. A. Boyne, of Bradford, who was received with applause and said:

Ladies and Gentlemen.

I feel that you flatter me. I want to thank you for the reception you have given me and for the kind words you have given me. I cannot express myself as I feel; nevertheless, I mean what I say. Now, what I have here isn't much, but it is all I can do, and that is all a horse can do. (Laughter). And if it isn't to the point you will have to excuse me and say it was from a feeble-minded young man—seventy last January.

ADDRESS OF MR. BOYNE.

The Rights of Directors of the Poor in the Management of Unruly and Incorrigible Inmates.

It is not a crime to be poor. The law exacts of Poor Directors a humane as well as a faithful administration of the affairs of their respective districts. Poor persons who are public charges are entitled to have from the district in which they reside humane treatment, wholesome food, and comfortable clothing. For a failure to perform their duty in this respect Poor Directors are subject to punishment. I find by the law of Pennsylvania that a Poor Director may be indicted for malfeasance in office if he relieves the poor where there is no necessity for such relief, or if he misuses the poor by housing them in filthy and unwholesome quarters, or if he exacts labor from a poor person who is not able to work, or if he mistreats or causes or suffers a poor person to receive physical maltreatment. Therefore, all rules for the management and control of the inmates of poorhouses should provide for the humane treatment of the unfortunate persons intrusted to the care of the Poor Directors. They should be supplied with wholesome food and comfortable clothing and a sufficiency of both of them. If of tender years or unable to work, they should not be required to perform tasks beyond their strength and injurious to their health.

However, the orderly maintenance of poor institutions carries with it the absolute necessity for the adoption and enforcement of certain rules and regulations for the orderly conduct of the poor persons there being cared for.

It is the duty of the Poor Directors to provide work for those inmates who are able to perform some service. It is their duty to see to it that the poor persons under their care preserve order and observe the regulations that are adopted for their government.

If the inmates who are of sufficient ability refuse to perform the work alloted to them, or become disorderly and refuse to submit to the rules and regulations, what can the Poor Directors do about it? The statutes of this State throw very little light upon this subject. If a poor charge refuses to perform the work alloted to him by the Poor Directors he is liable to penalties imposed by law upon vagrants and the statute fixes the penalty for vagrancy: "Commitment to labor upon any county farm, or upon the roads and highways of any city, county, township, or borough, or in any house of correction, poorhouse, workhouse, or common jail for a term not less than thirty days and not exceeding six months."

But for infractions of rules and regulations of conduct and decorum we do not, so far as I can ascertain, get much help from the statutes. Directors of the "county homes for the destitute" coming under the provisions of the Act of May 8, 1876, have "full power to make and ordain such ordinances, rules, and regulations as they think proper, convenient, and necessary for the government, control, and support of poorhouses and of the revenues thereunto belonging, and of all such persons as shall come under their cognizance; Provided, The same be not repugnant to this or any other law of the State or the United States," and, provided, further, "that the same shall not have any force and effect until they have been submitted to the Court of Quarter Sessions for the time being of said county and shall have received the approval of the same," and in cases where this act governs the right of the Directors to provide rules which shall punish unruly and incorrigible inmates must be exercised in accordance with the provisions of this law and where rules have been adopted with the approval of the Court they may be enforced. But in cases other than those coming under the provisions of this statute the absolute necessity of having proper order and decorum, in my judgment, carries with it the right to establish proper rules of conduct to be observed by the inmates and if the inmates fail to comply, to prescribe reasonable penalties and punishments for the infraction of these rules, even to the extent of reasonable physical punishment. Can it not be said that the position of a Poor Director, so far as concerns the management of the inmates under his care, is analogous to that of a teacher of a public school who has a right, in order to preserve order and decorum, to administer such reasonable punishment, physical or otherwise, as may be necessary to secure order and decorum?

Fred Fuller, Chairman of the Committee on Officers for the coming year, presented the following report which, on motion, was adopted:

Your Committee on Officers beg leave to nominate the following-named persons as the officers of this Association for the year 1910-1911:

For President—H. W. Osche, Allegheny.

For Vice Presidents—Mrs. Sue Williard, Indiana; Dr. I. M. Murdock, Polk; Dr. W. A. Payne, Lackawanna; Mrs. Mary E. Bowie, Fayette; Mr. I. S. Smith, Chester; Mr. Frank Bausman, Lancaster.

For Secretary and Treasurer—L. C. Colborn, Somerset.

For Assistant Secretary—Col. E. P. Gould, Erie.

TALK BY MR. McALONEY.

The discussion, "The Blind, Deaf and Dumb, and Feeble-minded as Wards of the State; Their Education, Training, and Ability to Support Themselves," was opened by Mr. Thomas S. McAloney, of Pittsburg, who said:

I will confine my talk to the blind. It seems queer that we have so many erroneous ideas in regard to the blind and the deaf. People seem to think that a child's nature is entirely changed, and they treat the child in a different way from the other members of the family. The little one isn't required to do the things that the brothers and sisters are required to do, and when he is sent to school the neighbors of the family are all broken up to think it is going "to a blind asylum." Some people still call them asylums; you can put such people down as being fifty years behind the times. The State cannot afford to have specialty teachers in every town, so as matter of economy they establish schools in some locality, where the blind and deaf are taken. They are not asylums, and the child receives its education not as charity, but as its right. The child is placed in the kindergarten department, like any other child, and the education there is no different from any other school. In the kindergarten the child is taught the same as his brother, except as to distinguishing colors. They can play games and do paper cutting and all such things. Then he is taught to write. Instead of a printed page he has raised dots and this is the slate that he uses to write on (indicates). There are six dots here, and from them the whole alphabet is formed. The pencil he uses to write with is simply a little piece of steel to punch the dots. When he has completed his kindergarten work he is placed in the main school, where he is given eight years public school work, the same as other boys and girls. In his work in arithmetic he uses this slate (shows slate). It is filled with holes and there is a tack put in that represents the figures. In his geography he has raised maps, and the history is conducted like other children's work. If he wishes to go on he is given a regular High School course of three years; that gives them a good business education. They use the typewriter and are taught bookkeeping and to use pencil and paper to write longhand.

We have one of the most unique stores in the world. We find that many of the boys and girls are stunted because they had no practical knowledge how to run a store—they are dependent on someone else to keep the books and we cannot always trust our friends. Three years ago we established a store. They go to the wholesale houses and purchase the goods, as any other storekeeper would do. They sell to the pupils for cash. They receipt the bills, as any merchant would do, and then the storekeeper turns over his store to the clerk, who in turn acts as storekeeper. This has proved very satisfactory, and has caused inquiry from all over the world. It gives them a practical education and brings them in touch with the wholesale people.

Along with this they are given a thorough musical education. Every child in the school is taught piano and vocal and violin, and a certain percentage the organ. If you could hear them sing and play you would think they were as competent, or more so, than their seeing brothers and sisters, in that respect. We gave a cantata in Carnegie Hall last year and the critics said it was exceedingly good.

We give them industrial training. They make good piano tuners. We have broommakers, but that isn't paying at present, but as a mop-maker, combined with that, they can make a very good living. The girls have sewing and knitting and crocheting and the making of garments. One thing that is useful for them is massage teaching.

The physical development of the child is carefully looked after. The blind child, at home, doesn't take much exercise; he usually sits in the corner; his father and mother are afraid something will happen to him if he goes out playing. We pay particular attention to the development of the body. We have a splendid gymnasium and it is compulsory for every child to receive training there. They are very fond of roller skating. Then we have a fine swimming pool which they enjoy. On the athletic field the blind boy can hold his own with the seeing boy. Imagine fifty yards in 5⅔ seconds. Last year in the National Association for the Blind contests our girls took fourth place in the United States and the boys took second place. They can broad-jump and high-jump like other boys and are expert at putting the shot. So being blind doesn't make them helpless and useless. We form that idea from the blind we see on the street corner and the blind persons in the almshouses. Very few of the people we meet on the streets begging ever attended a school for the blind.

Now, are the blind able to support themselves? Is this education we are giving them wasted? We graduated a class of nine from the High School last year. I never saw a finer set of boys and girls graduate from any school. One of the girls went home and found her father seriously ill; she took his place in the store, and her care of the father has made him very comfortable. She has been able to treat him during the summer months. So if massage doesn't do any more good than that there has been so much accomplished. We expect to get her a place in the hospital. Three of the boys that left us became piano tuners. They are making a very good living. Four of the boys sang at concerts; during the summer time they received $100 each. One of the boys has been employed in a sawmill all summer. He screened all the sawdust and helped to load the cars with spools for the cotton mills.

During the last year there has been established in Pittsburg an Association for the Adult Blind, and you will probably hear more of that in the next year.

A great many of the blind lose their sight after their school life and they are helpless and discouraged. I receive many pitiful letters to admit them to our school. It is impossible to admit adults, and our Board of Directors, with the help of some of the ladies' clubs of Pittsburg, started this association. The city has given $10,000 for the opening of a workshop, and they are going to start workshops in the various cities of Pennsylvania for the blind. It will do a good work. An able-bodied man with a family of five or six children, suddenly deprived of his sight, doesn't know what to do. He is ready to commit suicide, or to do anything, and this association will give him an opportunity of earning a living. The blind should be placed in the workshops of the seeing men. We have a girl who is working in a candy shop. You may have a chance to employ some blind person; give them a chance.

There is one thing that is very dear to my heart. One-third of all the children that pass through our schools for the blind should never have been blind. Their eyesight could have been saved. So many little children, shortly after birth, will have a little inflammation of the eye; the nurse may wipe it carelessly with a rag and then rub the other eye, and in the course of a week or so the eyesight is gone. If that child could have had a few drops of one per cent nitrate of silver put on a little cotton and put in the eye the sight could have been saved. There is no child that is born but should have that one per cent put in the eye, as a preventive.

If we can save the little ones we will be accomplishing a great deal. Every father and mother should spread the news that there is danger with the eyes of the new-born, and that their eyes can be saved. One-third of the blind children in the institutions of the United States and Europe could have been saved. Look how much the State would save if they would make laws and enforce this preventive measure. If you can spread this news around you will be doing a good work. I thank you for your attention.

Applause.

Mr. Colborn: I want to thank Mr. McAloney for this talk. I have been to their institution, and was greatly impressed with the work there. Last week I was in Pittsburg, and one of the former students of that school is now a lawyer in one of the counties, and he argued his case before the Chief Justice there, and he had his manuscript for argument printed as has been stated here, and it was a curiosity to all the lawyers present. He cautioned us not to steal his argument from him.

Mr. Weller (Pittsburg): We have had one of the graduates in stenography from this school in our office. She holds her position with the others. She keeps her notes of the names and addresses in the raised system, and she is competent to take her place among ordinary stenographers. You will be surprised if you inquire further as to what the blind can do. It suggests this thought: If people so handicapped as the blind are can be made self-supporting, why can't we make a larger percentage of our dependents self-supporting?

Dr. Martin W. Barr, Superintendent of the Feeble-minded Institute at Elwyn, Pa., was introduced to the Convention at this point by President Wilson and was received with applause. He read the following very interesting and valuable paper:

ADDRESS OF DR. MARTIN W. BARR.

Some Causes of the Increase of Feeble-mindedness.

The etiology of mental defect, long a matter of research among those engaged in its care, has become of late a subject of vital interest to the general public who, brought face to face with assured and startling increase, now begin to investigate cause with the one aim, it is to be hoped, of devising means of prevention.

The first steps toward that end—the separation and massing of numbers—have already been taken, educators and guardians of public safety recognizing as never before the necessity of classes for backward children, of juvenile courts and the reduplication of reformatories and houses of detention.

In the handling of these masses they turn naturally for information to the institutions for defectives already engaged in this work of separation, and, meeting thus on a common ground, may we not hope to press on, each aiding the other in the one aim of checking an increase which threatens to vitiate the very well-springs of society?

The nineteenth century, so prolific on advance in many lines, will have cause to reckon not the least among its achievements, its care and study of degeneracy in some 200 asylums for the feeble-minded throughout the civilized world, if the ultimate result of such massing be, not only protection to the unfortunate, but such a check upon this most subtle form of race suicide as must tend to a further cultivation of higher racial ideals.

This century of investigation has discovered in the study of many thousands of defectives, such malnutritive conditions in one generation as must preclude all hope of its healthful generative qualities, and furthermore, an exaggerated sexuality that cannot fail to transmit either its disease or its defect. Yet in the light of such revelation, not grasped by society at large, the work of procreation by inefficient agents goes on, flooding the world with a defective population of all grades from the absolutely harmless idiot to the keen-witted, irresponsible moral imbecile fore-doomed, if not protected, to a life of vice or crime, or either as victims or seducers such sure agents in the reproduction of numbers as to necessitate the multiplication of institutions and asylums as is portrayed to-day.

And even these do but temporarily stem the tide, for hardly do they discharge their inmates when the work begins anew; and just here do we come to the main cause of ill; for this increase that we deplore is undoubtedly due to the non-recognition of a vicious element thus scattered broadcast, often rendered more dangerous by concealment of defect. It has been repeatedly observed that families in which neuropathic members appear are often more prolific than the average.

If, as Ribot says, "Among the various functions which in their united action constitute life two are primary—nutrition, which preserves the individual, and generation, which perpetuates the species—then that influence which tends most to hamper the one and to injure or exaggerate the other, is the surest enemy to healthful life, the foe most to be dreaded; and this is an inheritance of mental defect of which the condition of the mother during gestation is largely one and the same. An heredity of disease may be purely physiologic, breaking down the physical powers, but not necessarily the mental; but heredity of imbecility is both physiologic and psychologic, the whole being, physical, mental, and moral, enters starved upon a maimed existence, idiotic or imbecile. This is no fanciful theory, as 1,030 cases out of the 4,050 which I have carefully studied attest to a stern reality.

It has been computed that in the United States the rate of increase within the past decade of the abnormal classes—insane and feeble-minded—is not less than 155 per cent, and that there is correspondingly rapid increase in other civilized countries. And this is further indorsed by the reports of the last International Congress of Prisons, which claims that a large proportion of the prison population on whom is expended some millions of dollars annually, owe their existence to a defective strain. This is but corroborating reports of over half a century back, verifying fears then expressed.

The Massachusetts Commission, 1848, in its report of 574 idiots, shows over 22 per cent due to heredity of mental defect, direct or collateral, thus: Forty-nine idiotic persons who have one near relative idiotic, nine who have two, six with three, four with four, six with five, three with ten, one with nineteen; fifty whose parents are either idiotic or insane, and twenty-one who are themselves parents. This is interesting when compared with the eighth annual report of the Massachusetts State Board of Public Charities in 1872, which states that "idiots increase in numbers and the rate of increase is greater than that of the general population."

The Connecticut Commission, in its investigations as far back as 1856, found fifty-one idiots in seventeen families, being an average of three to a family, and two families had each five idiots. It further reports two or three towns in which there are families wholly imbecile, both parents and children. "In one instance, where a pauper female idiot lived in one town, the town authorities hired an idiot belonging to another town, and not then a pauper, to marry her, and the result has been that the town to which the male idiot belongs has for many years had to support the pair and three idiot children."

Adequate cause is reported for 310 of 531 cases examined; of these, defective mental capacity in one or both parents is noted in 65 out of 185 cases; consanguinity in 20 cases; tendencies to consumption, scrofula, or eruptive disease, 41 of 145; fright or grief to mother during the period of gestation in 53 out of 108 cases; epilepsy in 76; masturbation in 19; feeble condition of parents, 33 of 163 cases; insanity, blindness, and mixed neuroses in 70 of 164 cases, and vicious habits of parents—what we would doubtless class as moral imbecility, in which, however, intemperance (76 cases) is included—in 95 out of 235 cases. As will easily be seen, a large proportion of these causes may be resolved into an heredity of imbecility.

The argument has been advanced that degeneracy is not produced, but only revealed, by a higher civilization. But the point not considered is that in the onward march of civilization, its fruits of science and invention have in all ages too often been seized upon by the luxurous voluptuary to minister to and to excite new phases of sexual pervasion. A notable example of this was found in a famous murder trial that but recently held the attention of the entire civilized world.

True, we may not arrest the current of good in the stream of time, but we may stamp out and cut off with relentless hand its perverted use which threatens worse than the arrest we refrain from, through the pollution of the very life-blood of the race, and this will be achieved only when sterilization of the unfit is made the natural sequence of separation and segregation.

Causes of defiency have been broadly considered in three groups—influences before, after, and at time of birth—and these may be yet further condensed into hereditary and accidental, with a large preponderance toward the former.

This may be noted first in direct transmission—inevitable in cases of defect, although sometimes skipping a generation. In a study of some 4,050 cases I find it a predominating cause. This may be due in some measure to the factor of environment, the all-pervading influences of our highly nervous American life, as contrasted with the quieter life habits of Great Britain and Scandinavia, in whose category of cause the influence of tuberculosis and of alcoholism come first.

No country of Europe has shown such a record as that presented by the study of the Tribe of Ishmael, where the issue of one diseased man and a half-breed woman is traced through forty-eight years, giving no less than 5,000 degenerates. Nor do we find such a history as that of the Juke family, where 1,200 persons, the descendants of five degenerate sisters, repeat in successive generations disease and defect in their worst forms—insanity, idiocy, and certain reversion to original types.

Habitual drunkenness of parents is an undoubted factor where it has produced a hardening of tissue or change in nervous condition, but it may, on the other hand, be over-estimated as an absolutely direct cause; the nervous condition it occasions in the woman during parturition or even at the time of copulation must also be considered. My cases show but 4.46 per cent and almost always in combination with some neuroses. Yet in England Shuttleworth and Beach give nearly three times that—16.38.

There is a consensus among all peoples that the condition of mothers during gestation must be guarded most carefully, lest the result be disastrous. Thus the Caprian women, even the poorest peasants, strive to surround themselves with beautiful things—whatever may be within reach, be it only lovely flowers—with the result of an offspring unrivaled for strength and beauty. In France, where the residents of the Commune of Batz on the Loire Inferieure acknowledge and bow to the laws of rational living, mental defect is absolutely unknown, and the number of children born is above the ordinary.

Tuberculosis in parents has its influence in many cases, as do cancer and syphilis in somewhat lessening degree.

Of causes acting at time of birth are found the various influences retarding or complicating delivery. The abnormal condition of the mother, injuries to the head resulting from instrumental delivery, and asphyxia are found prominent in both English and American studies, not grading so high, however, as the influences before and after birth.

The third division, viz: Causes acting after birth, presenting development of defect the result of either accident or disease, shows first traumatism—injuries to the head from blows or falls—and next infantile convulsions, which in the majority of cases prove to be true epilepsy. Of the acute diseases precipitating defect, scarlatina, meningitis, and measles are the chief, these often followed by inflammation of the ear with extension to the membranes of the brain.

The true effect of acute disease is often traced to the lessening of the power of resistance through which the individual succumbs naturally to a neurotic heredity or environment heretofore combatted; general malnutrition apparently causing cerebral atrophy. This is also noted in what is known as idiocy by deprivation, in which the lack or loss of any one sense avenue will preclude or arrest the development more directly dependent upon that one avenue; and the mind suffers a certain starvation, so to speak, as in the case of the blind or the deaf-mute—mutism being an acknowledge example. True it is that other senses may be so aroused as to counterbalance or supply the loss of the one, but when there is lack of nerve force from weakness engendered by causes either congenital or accidental this fails, and idiocy by deprivation ensues.

Here again comes the necessity, as great as that already noted for the mothers during parturition, of favorable environment for the child; an environment that persistently allures and entices, may in time awaken dulled senses that must otherwise sink into apathy and utter idiocy.

Summing up the main causes of evil, we find heredity the prime factor, and therefore the first to be met, in the fight against rapid increase. If race culture is to be held superior to the selfish gratification of the individual, too often mere emotionalism the offshoot of ignorant fantasy, or worse still, of exaggerated sexual impulse, as exemplified in the boy and girl marriages of the day, there can be no doubt that marriage laws need to be so amended that applicants for license should show a clean bill of health, or else affidavit of physician as to inability to transmit, constituting, so to speak, a racial guarantee. But one may say the inevitable result of marriage made difficult is, as shown in other countries, its non-observance. Then why not place such illicit cohabitation in the penal code to receive its just punishment as offense against the public weal? Such provision would fight the battle on normal grounds, and should appeal to the patriotism and intelligence of every responsible citizen. But there is yet another field to be covered, where irresponsible degenerates congregate or lie in ambush either as the victim or the destroyer, and I contend that from this class, to whom comprehension of the higher calling of parenthood is forever sealed, should be taken the power of procreation. This may be accomplished only through segregation and permanent separation—where a sexualization shall accomplish its work of mercy in committing to a perpetual childhood the abnormally childish individual rendered powerless to transmit his sad heritage of ill.

There is so much prejudice and misunderstanding on the part of the general public that perhaps it might be well for me to go somewhat into detail and explain more specifically the character of the operation itself.

It is not always essential that both testicles and ovaries be removed, but I prefer it, as absolute removal is a certainty beyond a peradventure, and when castration and oophorectomy are performed in the young, desire almost always ceases entirely, or is at least held in abeyance. The operation is not in the least serious. The usual cleansing before—a few whiffs of ether—and the operation is over. There is a slight drop in temperature, followed by little or no fever, and after a couple of days quiet in bed, the parts well bathed and kept antiseptically dressed, the patient is as well as ever.

If for sentimental reasons the removal of the testes and ovaries will not be considered, vasectomy—simply the excising of a section of the vas deferens in the male—and fallectomy—the cutting of the fallopian tubes per vaginam in the female—are feasible, and so absolutely harmless that in the male the operation may be accomplished under cocaine anesthesia. After vasectory and fallectomy, the sexual organs do not wither or atrophy, and there remains sexual desire and sexual power, but no power to impregnate.

Under either operation the individual, otherwise unharmed, may likely live out his full period and, with animal instincts so subdued as to be no longer a menace to himself or society, may realize and enjoy life as never before.

On a former occasion I have gone so fully into the etiology of idiocy and imbecility that herein I venture to digress somewhat from the title of the paper as requested, and have touched, after a brief resume of the most salient points, upon the subject most intimately associated with etiology, viz: Prevention. And with no wish to trench upon the prurient, I have endeavored to present prevention so clearly that he who runs may read, comprehending also that I do not advocate the indiscriminate use of the knife, save for certain classes, and these only after due consideration and consultation.

Mr. Colborn: Dr. Woodbury was to address us upon this question, but he is now in France. However, he has sent me his paper, which Dr. Srodes will present.

Dr. Srodes here read the following paper prepared by Dr. Frank Woodbury, of Philadelphia, Secretary of the Commission of Lunacy:

PAPER BY DR. FRANK WOODBURY.

The Increase in Insanity.

Nearly two centuries have elapsed since Pennsylvania first undertook the task of caring for the indigent insane. The earliest provision for maintaining this class of unfortunates is to be found in the records of the Upland Court of Delaware County in 1676. The following extract from the archives is of interest:

"Jan Cornellissan, of Amesland, Complayning to ye Court that his son Erick is bereft of his natural Senses and is turned quyt madd and yt; he being a poor man is not able to maintaine him; Ordered: that three or four persons bee hired to build a little block-house at Amesland for to put in the said madman, and at the next Court order will be taken yt; a small Levy be laid for to pay for the building of ye house and the maintaining of ye said madman according to laws of ye Government."—From the History of Pennsylvania Hospital, Morton & Woodbury, Revised Edition, Philadelphia, 1897, page 4.

It is very evident that the learned Court, in making this order and providing the means for carrying it into effect, established the precedent for the public care of the indigent insane in the State of Pennsylvania. The existing laws of "ye Government" at that early day fully authorized this course, and it was also sanctioned by the dictates of humanity and religion. Nearly a century later sundry inhabitants of the province of Pennsylvania presented a petition to the General Assembly, praying for the erection of a suitable hospital for the care of persons "distempered in mind and deprived of their rational faculties." As a result the Pennsylvania Hospital was founded in 1751 by an act of Assembly, which was approved by the Governor May 11, 1751, and, although this was not a State institution, but a private corporation, the Assembly, for "the farther encouragement of this beneficient undertaking," gave it an appropriation of 2,000 pounds sterling, in two yearly payments "to be applied to the founding, building, and furnishing of the same," conditioned upon the contributors raising an equal amount by subscription.

By the passage of this act the State established another precedent, which was the appropriation of public funds to the use of a private charitable corporation, engaged in the care of the indigent and dependent, the justice of whose claims upon the State had been already admitted.

The policy of the Commonwealth in caring for the indigent insane has been consistently carried on until the present day. The single madman has grown into a multitude. To be exact, the number of indigent insane in the State and county hospitals in Pennsylvania on September 30, 1909, was 14,800. The number at present will aggregate in round numbers nearly 16,000, and the appropriations for their benefit made by the last Legislature amount to something over $6,000,000 for 1910 and 1911.

There can be no question of the fact that insanity is increasing. For the last ten years the statistics show a steady gain in the number under treatment in this State of from 500 to 600 a year. In other words, at each biennial session of the Legislature provision must be made for the medical, custodial, and hygienic care of from 1,000 to 1,200 patients—that is, if the accommodations are to keep pace with the demand.

This increase has been observed elsewhere. The sixty-fourth report of the Commission in Lunacy of Great Britain, recently issued, shows that the number of insane persons in Great Britain has steadily increased in recent years. As stated by our own Government authorities, so is it reported in England, this increase has not only been in proportion to the natural increase of population, but also absolutely. The insane are increasing slightly more rapidly than the ratio of growth of the population at large. Their increase in Great Britain, however, for last year, 1909, was somewhat below the average, and I think that this is also true in Pennsylvania. Having established the fact that insanity in increasing, and that this increase has been especially marked during the past decade, let us very briefly consider the influences to which this may be due. It is acknowledged at the outset that the causes of insanity are numerous and complex, and that several causes may co-operate to produce mental unsoundness. I will enumerate a few:

(1) The large cities, with their congested areas, where the struggle for existence is hard, and children are brought up under most unfavorable conditions, surrounded by vice and intemperance, these are culture grounds for insanity. It is worthy of note that conicidentally with the increase of insanity in the last ten years there has been observed a decided movement of population toward the great cities. It is estimated, if the present ratio of increase of population continues, New York, for instance, will, in the year 1935, have 11,000,000 of inhabitants. What effect this may have upon the inhabitants of the large cities in the direction of degeneracy, pauperism, and crime, may well afford a profitable subject of study. There can be little room for doubt that such conditions make for an increase of insanity.

(2) Infectious diseases and the introduction of their toxic products into the blood are acknowledged causes of insanity. In this connection, I will call your attention to the fact that influenza, or the grip, exerts very deleterious effects upon the nervous system and is one of the recognized causes of insanity. The Health Department of Chicago issued a bulletin some years ago containing the following positive expression upon this point:

"Influenza, which has been prevalent frequently in epidemic form in all parts of the world during the last dozen years or so, not only disastrously complicates other diseases, but exerts a most baneful effect upon the nervous system, causing all forms of mental disturbances, from mere irritability of temper to suicidal melancholia and suicidal mania. The mental equilibrium, not only of individuals, but of nations, has been profoundly affected by this malignant malady during the last decade. The investigations of the Coroner's office show that a large proportion of the suicides in Chicago during this period had previously suffered from the grip." In 1899, the year before the grip appeared in the United States, there were in this country 5,340 deaths by suicide; in 1901, the year after it appeared, there were 7,245, or an increase of 35.6 per cent. In Chicago the ratio of deaths by suicide for twenty years previous (per 100,000) amounted to 12.6 per cent; during the influenza decade it increased to 23.3 per cent, or nearly double. In New York it ran up from 16.4 per cent to 21.5 per cent, an increase of 52.4 per cent over the previous twenty years' rate of increase.—Dr. Smith Ely Jelliffe, Influenza and the Nevous System, Philadelphia Medical Journal, 1902.

I submit this cause also for your consideration in attempting to discern the influences favoring an increase in insanity. I think it noteworthy that the children who were born during the grip decade, many of whose parents were doubtless suffering with this disease, and some of whom were poisoned by it in early childhood, are now coming to maturity. May not many cases of imbecility, constitutional inferiority, and dementia praecox be due to this cause? A fruitful source of neuroses and psychoses is the congenital hypoplasia, which would naturally be expected to be found in the children of grip-infected parents.

(3) There is another source of insanity which can only be briefly referred to. The Director of one of the largest hospitals for the insane in Japan—Prof. K. Saito—is reported to have made the statement recently that "The rapid increase in insanity in Japan is due to two factors—one a higher standard of living occasioned by the spreading of the educational idea, and the other the hard times and the want occasioned by the striving to live up to the new standard. * * * There is no doubt that insanity follows civilization, and Japan is no exception to the rule."

I think that the intolerable burdens laid upon the adolescent brain by improper methods of teaching is responsible for many cases of early mental breakdown and lifelong invalidism and insanity. Melancholy instances of this crime against humanity may be seen in all of our large hospitals for the insane.

(4) Finally the decided increase in the cost of living must have had its effect in increasing the number of the insane who are cared for in public institutions. When times are easy and living cheap the cost of maintaining weak-minded children or the senile feeble-minded is not of much consequence, and they are tenderly cared for or tolerated at home, as the case may be, but when times are hard and living expenses high it is only natural that the burden of caring for the dependent weak-minded or the harmless insane shall be shifted from families to the public authorities. At the present day there are thousands of this class who are supported at the expense of the taxpayers, and who could be cared for by their families, and would be so cared for if it were not so easy to have them committed as public charges.

(5) The use of poisons, especially narcotics and anodyne drugs in childhood, and habit-forming drugs in adult life, are responsible for a large proportion of an indigent insane. Where parents are addicted to alcohol, cocaine, opium, and other brain-destroying agents, it cannot be expected that their children could be normal in mind or body, and, in fact, many are constitutionally inferior, imbeciles, or idiots.

The opinion is held by many alienists that insanity is more often caused by chemical changes in the blood than by organic changes in the brain, which was formerly held to be the case. "The life of the flesh is the blood." Puerperal insanity, which is one of the most frequent causes of insanity as reported in Great Britain, is very rare in this country because antiseptic midwifery has practically abolished puerperal infection, or childbed fever. More than one-fourth of the recent admissions reported by Kraepelin in Germany were due to alcoholism and syphilis. As recently pointed out by Dr. Thomas W. Salmon, these are preventable causes of insanity.—Popular Science Monthly, June, 1910, page 557.

I will not attempt to carry this line of argument farther. I have shown that there has been a decided increase in insanity, practically everywhere where records are kept. Some of the most potent influences have been indicated, and in conclusion, for our encouragement, I have shown that the evil is not irremediable, as some of the chief causes may be rendered inoperative. Indeed, there is ground for the belief that, as the causes of insanity are better understood, and the knowledge of its means of prevention more appreciated, the number of cases of insanity will steadily decrease in proportion with the adoption by the people at large of more rational methods of living. The aim of each should be to have a healthy mind in a healthy body.

"Ill fares the land to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates, but men decay."

It is but a truism to say that in proportion as an increasing number of men govern their lives by principles that are "safe and sane" the number of insane in the community will progressively diminish, and we will be relieved of the unpleasant duty of calling attention to further increase of insanity.

Dr. Woodbury's paper was received with applause.

Fred Fuller, of Scranton, here presented the "Statistical Report of the Charities of the State of Pennsylvania."

Mr. Fuller: I am not going to read this paper; there is too much of it. There is a large amount of work involved in preparing such a paper. They thought they would give me the whole world. To go through the State of Pennsylvania and ascertain the number of institutions and the number receiving aid would take me at least six months, and if the Association would give me $5,000 and pay my expenses I would be happy to do it. I have confined my statements to the appropriations made by the State of Pennsylvania to all institutions except those including children, which I made last year. This report is valuable to every member of the Association and a very proper place for it is in the Annual Report. I submit this paper and request that it be printed.

Upon motion of Mr. Osche, it is ordered printed in the report of the proceedings of this Convention. The paper follows:

Mr. George H. Butler, of Wilkes-Barre, was here introduced by President Wilson and read the following paper on "Desertion":

PAPER BY MR. BUTLER.

Desertion.

Desertion by a husband from his wife is prohibited by the Divine law, for it is written therein that "a man shall cleave unto his wife."

Desertion and non-support of the family, essentially, are the greatest evils in defective home conditions.

Every one recognizes that parents should feed, clothe, shelter, protect, and educate the lives they bring into the world until such time as their progeny are able to care for themselves.

At the instant of the birth of a child such duty devolves upon the parent. The instinct of Nature prompts the performance of such duty and man alone, of all animated beings, is the only creature who sometimes fails in it.

To fail thus in this fundamental duty without good reason is to violate, not only the law of man and the Divine precept, but also the law of Nature.

Unfortunately, there is nothing so common to-day in our populated communities as family desertion and non-support, and the misery of it all is that it is caused, not so much by lack of work or other economic reasons, as by addiction to drink, ficklesness, and infidelity, and a moral botuseness as to the parent's duty to the children.

Where a family is destitute and must apply to others for assistance, such remissness on the part of its natural head as desertion and failure to support becomes a matter of public concern, and ceases to be a family matter only.

The community, under such circumstances, should be enabled to inaugurate proceedings to remedy the trouble, even though the wife, through fear or for any other reason, be unwilling to begin the action herself. Means should be devised to effectually attain the end of the law, the support of the family and the relief, consequently, of the community from the burden.

In a recent article entitled "The Court of Sorrow," by Victor Rousseau, he stated: "Domestic troubles, and especially desertions, are in chief measure due to ignorance, misunderstanding, and a misconception of the mutual obligations of parents. In many States desertion has been made a misdemeanor where there are in the family children under the age of sixteen years, thereby rendering the deserter liable to extradition, but neither the police nor the District Attorney can devote the money or time required for tracing deserters by reason of the flood of more urgent business; furthermore, the apprehension and imprisonment of the offender are no boon to the wife and family."

I will not attempt to explain the causes of desertion or non-support, which are as numerous and as complicated as are any causes of destitution and of crime.

Deserters are lacking in a sense of moral responsibility, and their failure is of a criminal character and should be dealt with as theft, or the obtaining of money under false pretenses, or even, in aggravated cases, as assault and manslaughter are dealt with; for in cases of helpless women in the throes of childbirth the lives and welfare of innocent children are at stake, and as long as the family is the unite of human society the obligation to provide for the family must be recognized voluntarily or be compulsorily enforced.

There are husbands, so called, who desert their wives on the occasion of each childbirth, returning after some weeks to find that medical attendance, nursing, medicines, and supplies have been furnished without expense to them, and even a stock of infants' and children's clothing, which will probably last until the advent of the next infant. There are men, also "so called," who go away every winter, or at every approach of hard times, or whenever any money comes in, and who take the money, of course, with them.

The desertion of wife and children by the legal head of the family, with the deliberate purpose of evading their support, has become a serious evil in the United States, entailing not only a great expenditure of public and private relief funds, but causing untold suffering to sick women and neglected children, and seriously impairing public health and morals.

It has been stated that of all the families receiving aid from charitable associations, no less than one in ten owe their destitution to the desertion of the father, and possibly the proportion is even greater.

In the subdivision of the Central Poor District of Luzerne County, which has long been under my personal charge as Director, I find this state of affairs since January, 1910:

There have been 132 destitute families requiring out-door relief. Of these, sixty-one families, involving 168 children under sixteen years of age, ascribed their poverty to such causes as sickness, temporary or permanent accidents, and numerous other causes of destitution.

There were of this number thirty-six widows, involving ninety-four children under sixteen years of age; these widows were mostly the wives of miners and were rendered destitute over night by accidents in or about the mines. Of these thirty-six widows, twenty-nine of them were foreign-born.

There were also of this number thirty-five desertion cases, involving 123 children under sixteen years of age, and twenty of these families were of foreign birth. The same conditions will be found in other subdivisions of the Central Poor District, situate in the mining territory.

Thus it will be seen from the above that more than one family in four of those requiring relief do so as the result of desertion.

The trend of recent legislation is, perhaps, best shown in the provisions of a law passed by the Legislature of 1903, and it will be of interest to examine the evolution of the legislative enactments of our State to the present time.

The earliest legislation on record for the relief of the poor of Pennsylvania was enacted by the Colonial Assembly, A. D. 1700, and was entitled "An act for the better provision of the poor."

This act was repealed by the Act of February 7, 1705, entitled "An act for the relief of the poor."

An act to prevent poor and impotent persons being imported into the province of Pennsylvania was passed February 14, 1729.

Next follows the Act of March 9, 1771, 1 Dallas Laws, 569, which repeals and supplies all former acts relating to the poor, and was in its turn repealed by subsequent legislation, the most sweeping of which is the Act of June 13, 1836. The Act of 1771 was the first law in this country to regulate desertion. The Act of June 13, 1836, was largely taken from that of 1771.

Under the earlier laws relating to desertion, the law did not provide for imprisonment of a person who was charged with the support of the pauper, except when there was no property of such person out of which the support could be raised by the process. In case there was no real or personal estate, it was lawful for the Court to commit such person to the jail of the County, there to remain until he or she should comply with such order, give security for the performance thereof, or be discharged by due course of law.

The law considered desertion an offense; not indictable, indeed, but punishable by imprisonment, unless security should be given, to comply with the order of the court.

Then followed the Desertion Act of April 13, 1867, P. L. 78, providing that any husband or father, being within this Commonwealth, who shall "separate himself from his wife or from his children, or from wife and children without reasonable cause, or shall neglect to maintain his wife or children," such deserting husband or father may be arrested and bound over, with one sufficient surety, to appear at the next Court of Quarter Sessions, there to answer the said charge of desertion.

The provisions of this law provide that, upon hearing, the Court may order the husband or father, he being of sufficient ability, to pay such sum as said Court shall think reasonable and proper for the comfortable support and maintenance of said wife or children, or both, not to exceed $100 per month, and to commit such person to the county jail until he comply with the order or give security.

The Act of April 13, 1907, changed the amount to be paid for the support and maintenance of wife and child to such sum as the Court shall think reasonable and proper.

In a decision of the Court construing the Desertion Act of April 13, 1867, it was decided that desertion is not a crime, and therefore the Governor will not grant a requisition on that ground alone.

In the Act of April 15, 1869, P. L. 75, which was a supplement to the Act of 1869, it was provided that whenever the Court of Quarter Sessions shall commit the person complained of to the county prison, there to remain until he comply with their order or given security, the Court at any time after three months, if they be satisfied of the inability of such person to comply with the said order, and give security, might discharge him from imprisonment.

The Act of March 13, 1903, P. L. 26, entitled "An act making it a misdemeanor for a husband or father to desert and neglect to support his wife or children, prescribing a penalty therefor, and making the wife a competent witness in such cases," defines "the word children to mean children under sixteen years of age, and such children over sixteen and under twenty-one years of age, as by reason of infirmity are incapable of supporting themselves," and that the word "separation" shall include every case where a husband has caused his wife to leave him by conduct on his part which would be grounds for "divorce."

The second section provides as follows: "If any husband or father, being within the limits of this Commonwealth, shall hereafter separate himself from his wife or from his children, or from wife and children, without reasonable cause, and shall wilfully neglect to maintain his wife or children, such wife or children being destitute, or being dependent wholly or in part on their earnings for adequate support, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor; and on conviction thereof be sentenced to imprisonment not exceeding one year and pay a fine not exceeding $100, or either, or both, at the discretion of the Court; such fine, if any, to be paid or applied in whole or in part to the wife or children, as the Court may direct; Provided, that no such conviction, payment of fine, or undergoing imprisonment shall, in any manner, affect the obligation of any order for support theretofore made against the defendant in the Court of Quarter Sessions, in the manner now provided by law; and Provided further, That, upon conviction, the Court may suspend sentence upon and during compliance by the defendant with any order for support theretofore made against him, as already made or as may thereafter be modified, in the manner now provided by law; and if no such order shall have been made, then the Court trying the defendant may make such order for the support by the defendant of his wife and children, or either of them, which order shall be subject to modification by the Court on cause shown, and may suspend sentence, upon and during the compliance by defendant with such order then made or as thereafter modified and entry of bond by defendant, with surety approved by the Court, conditioned on compliance with such order."

This law permits suspended sentence, declares that the wife is a competent witness, and that proof of separation and neglect to support shall be prima-facie evidence that such separation and neglect are wilful and without reasonable cause on part of the husband.

The Act of Auril 27, 1909, P. L. 260, requires that desertion cases shall be returned to the Court of Quarter Sessions immediately instead of to the next Court of Quarter Sessions.

Under the provisions of the Act of 1903, family deserters are liable to extradition and no longer have immunity by stepping over the State line. Similar acts may be found in forty-four States. In forty-one it is made a misdemeanor, to make it more easy of enforcement; in three States the failure to support wife and children has been made a felony.

In 1906 the Federal Government for the District of Columbia passed an act entitled "An act making it a misdemeanor in the District of Columbia to abandon or wilfully neglect to provide for the support and maintenance by any person of his wife or of his or her minor children in destitute or necessitous circumstances."

At the thirty-fourth annual convention held at West Chester in 1908, the Hon. William H. DeLacey, in a very comprehensive paper, explained the operation and enforcement of the act in the Juvenile Court of the District of Columbia.

Only legislation of a remedial nature, coupled with education, will in course of time lessen this growing evil.

Mr. Butler: It seems to me that the District Attorney's office, with the machinery around that place, should be the prosecutors of these deserters; in that way we can lessen this crime.

President Wilson: There will be a banquet, I am informed, at the Park Hotel to-night for the members and their friends. It is the wish of the committee and of all concerned that you avail yourselves of this banquet. We will have an address by Mr. Collins and others.

I think we have had a very profitable Convention. I have attended several of them, and I don't think I ever attended one where we had so many good treats in the way of addresses and papers. They have all been good; we have been highly favored. The only regret I have is the want of interest on the part of our people right here in Williamsport as to attending our sessions. I stand here to apoloigize for that; there has been a good deal going on this week, but at the same time I don't think that a sufficient excuse.

Mr. Colborn: If there is a reporter of one of the papers here I hope he will publish the criticism of our President. We have all felt the little interest taken by the people of Williamsport. I have attended ten or more of the National conferences, and I say this without fear of contradiction: That no better work, no better papers, were presented at any of the National conferences than have been presented here at this Convention. (Applause.)

Hon. E. A. Boyne, Bradford: I join our worthy Secretary in what he says. I had the honor of being at Buffalo, and the addresses and papers here were, to my mind, better than many of them there. Every paper here gets right down to the subjects we are interested in.

President Wilson: I think the Association owes a great deal to these people who have prepared these addresses and papers, and at the proper time I think that appreciation should be shown.

Upon motion, the Convention here adjourned until 9:30 to-morrow morning.

A reception and banquet for the delegates, friends, and visitors was given at the Park Hotel on Wednesday evening, October 12th, by the Committee of Arrangements. Music was furnished by an orchestra, and, after partaking of the good things offered in the way of refreshments, Mr. John E. Cupp, Esq., who acted as toastmaster, introduced Mr. Frank P. Cummings, City Solicitor of Williamsport, who addressed the delegates briefly, again welcoming them to the city and wishing them a happy time. This was followed by remarks from the Hon. E. A. Boyne, of Bradford, and by Mr. Osche, the newly-elected President of the Association, and by Carl Kelsey, of the University of Pennsylvania, and by Mr. Edwin D. Sollenberger, Secretary C. A. S., of Philadelphia.

A social time was spent in the parlors of the hotel, during which time the delegates were entertained by orchestral music, and took occasion to become better acquainted with one another.

MORNING SESSION, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1910.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment at 9:30 a. m. and was called to order by President Wilson.

Col. E. P. Gould, Erie, offered the report of the Committee on Resolutions, and said:

"I want to say that the local member of our committee has never met with us. I told him last night that we were ignorant as to whom we should thank in Williamsport, and he promised to meet with us this morning, but he has failed to do so. In connection with the report of this committee I move that Mr. Culp be authorized to furnish to the Secretary additional resolutions to meet that want."

Upon motion of Mr. Osche, the report of the committee is adopted. The report was as follows:

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON RESOLUTIONS.

The Committee on Resolutions would report the following resolutions:

That our Association is to be congratulated on the most delightful weather that has continued during the entire session of the Convention.

For the many able addresses that have been delivered, showing the care, study, and labor given to the various subjects treated, and the thanks of the Convention are due to all who have by their services made this Convention so great a success.

That this Association earnestly recommends that a uniform system of poor law administration be established by law throughout the State.

That some legal provision should be made to enable the authorities to restrain women who are defective mentally and morally during the child-bearing age. This resolution is suggested by the address of Mrs. Adelaide B. Comfort, who comes to the Association with her message at the request of the Children's Aid Society of Chester County.

That we are thankful to the press of Williamsport for the publicity which their papers have given to our proceedings.

That we are especially thankful for the excellent music furnished by the young ladies.

That it is the opinion of this Association that wife and child desertion should be made a felony in order more effectually to enable the authorities to have those guilty of that crime who are outside of the State arrested and brought back for punishment. And by direction of this Convention we indorse and approve of the act which was presented to this Convention by the Hon. J. M. Robb, of Allegheny County, which received the approval of the Convention, and its enactment is recommended. By Order of the Committee.

Dr. Carl Kelsey, of the University of Pennsylvania, was next introduced by President Wilson, and was received with applause. He addressed the Convention as follows upon "Social and Living Conditions":

ADDRESS BY DR. KELSEY.

Ladies and Gentlemen.

I almost wish I could change my subject and speak of the things I think are needed in Pennsylvania, for the time will soon come when we must have better legislation with reference to our various charitable institutions. You have suggested one thing this morning, and that is more uniform laws with reference to poor relief, but there are many other things that need attention. The children are not overly-well cared for in Pennsylvania. The supervision in many districts is not what it might be; many of the agencies ought to be wiped out of existence because of their ignorance and criminal negligence. The time must soon come when we have some central public body in this State supervising the agencies caring for children. I think there is danger that some people, seeing some of these conditions, will rush to the Legislature with ill-considered bills. I have had my attention called to a bill being circulated now providing for a Juvenile Commission. I am very suspicious of that bill, and I hope it will be killed. I believe in commission for making reports and recommending measures to the Legislature, but I am not in favor of introducing into Pennsylvania irresponsible commissions controlling any line of work.

We must, of course, all pull together to gradually make such changes in the present laws and the administration of the laws as experience seems to make necessary. On the matter that has already been under discussion, I would ask you to remember that in law there is no reason why a person guilty of a misdemeanor cannot be extradicted from another State. The trouble is that a great many Judges and lawyers will not take the necessary steps to have it done.

I want you to remember that we are, first of all, physical beings; that as physical beings we are subject to certain laws and conditions of growth. I want to ask you to remember that we do not come into the world mature men and women, but we start our existence as simple cells. It is not for us to inquire now what gives those germ cells their wonderful power, but just to remember that we start as germ cells, and the biologist knows that one-half of the units that make up that germ cell come from the father and other half from the mother. The germ cells determine the heredity.

The child has a nine months' environment before it is born. Sometimes it is a good environment and sometimes a very bad one. That is a problem of environment, but not of heredity. It makes no difference whether a mother neglects a child before it is born or a year afterward; the child suffers in either case. Heredity determines what an individual may become; the environment determines what he does become. Most of the children are to mature into normal human beings. Some, unfortunately, will not become normal. Thus we have a group that are physically degenerate; for instance, the feeble-minded.

Every investigation that is made shows that feeble-mindedness is not a common variation in a normal family. When you investigate the history of the feeble-minded you find they come from feeble-minded stock. No case is on record where a normal child has been born of two feeble-minded parents. The majority of those born where one parent is feeble-minded will be feeble-minded; will become the ancestors of other generations if allowed to reproduce. I want to emphasize, again and again, the fact that we have thousands of feeble-minded living outside of institutions, and yearly reproducing themselves. If to-day we could stop the reproduction of the present feeble-minded the problem in the next generation would be insignificant. Now, inasmuch as our investigations show that even in the public schools we have feeble-minded children; that in our institutions we have feeble-minded girls and women, and on the streets feeble-minded prostitutes, it would seem as though the time had come for us to stop and take account, and whenever anyone comes under the control of any of the public agencies that the first thing should be to find the actual physical condition of that person, and if feeble-minded, for the sake of the feeble-minded person and of society, to see that such person never roams at large again.

Now, I have said that heredity is determined within the germ cell. I might go on for several hours to point out some of the practical results of our present knowledge that disease is not inherited; for if disease is due to some specific germ that germ is never a function of the normal human body; it is always an outside thing, no matter when it comes in contact with the human body. I would like to say here that from the standpoint of modern biology so long as human marriages are instituted on social, financial, political, and conventional grounds there will be no improvement or marked change in the human race. It might be possible, if you would allow that it was a high ideal for us to breed good strong men and women, to produce changes for the better, but so long as conventional matters determine marriage we shall not. That means that you cannot predicate physical or mental ability on the ground of social status, and the children of the well-to-do (supposing the stock is sound physically) will not average any higher in physical and mental ability than the children of the poorest people in the community (assuming again that that stock is normal).

What the parents do—whether they go to school and obey all the laws or whether they go to the gambling joint, and to the devil generally, as the saying is—makes no particular difference in the physical stock of the next generation. This, of course, having reference to the mother who neglects to care for her unborn child. Our physical condition depends on what our parents are physically; not what they do socially. At the moment the life of the individual child stars the social differences begin to manifest themselves. Though we may start on the same level of physical and mental possibilities the moment the environment begins to have its effect, then the differences begin.

If you and I are born physically normal what is the cause of our success or our failure of our taking care of ourselves and being financially independent, or of our failing to take care of ourselves, and being dependent? Now, ruling out this degenerate group, which you may find amongst all classes, and assuming we start with a group of people who are physically normal at birth, what is going to determine? In that case poverty must come from one of three or four things: It must come from the fact that the group into which we are born does not have sufficient control of the physical world to enable it to accumulate sufficient food supply, for there are groups living under such conditions. If we belong to a group that has, under favorable natural conditions, the power of getting a sufficient food supply, then it must lie either in the failure of that group to train the child to take its part, or we shall have to find some perversity in that child as it reaches maturity, which leads it to disregard the standards of society. If we find the cause in that latter mental attitude it is not yet certain that society's neglect of the child is not responsible for the child's attitude.

If we start off normal physical beings and if we live under such conditions that it is humanly possible to be efficient, and if we fail to become efficient the trouble must lie in our social institutions, or in the falure of the individual to accept and work in accordance with our social conditions.

Now, it is for that general reason that many of us are coming to feel that the important causes of poverty (barring again this degeneracy) are social causes, over which the individual, as such, has very little control. In the older days it was assumed there was almost a complete equality of moral responsibility. Irrespective of the training the child got it was assumed it would know and appreciate the distinctions as to right and wrong, and that it was equally to be blamed if it departed from the normal path, whether it came from a family with every opportunity or from a family in which no opportunity had been afforded for ordinary normal training. We have gone away from this. We ask, "Is this man, or woman, or child physically normal?" and if not we are dealing with a special class.

We shall find that approximately one-third of the cases coming before us for relief are in trouble because of industrial conditions; of labor problems. That approximately one-third come to our agencies because of sickness. In the main these are social, not personal.

Now, the average man on this earth has never been able to accumulate any great surplus. It means then, that the average man, in every community, is going to have about all he can do to keep his bills paid from day to day. When conditions become such that there is no unearned increment for the man who saves and invests, on the basis of $2.00 a day wages he is not going to save enough to keep him many years of non-earning, irrespective of the cause of his idleness. The only way that this situation can be met is by some form of insurance. We cannot reckon in advance when any given person's dependency will come, but we can do it when we are dealing with masses of the people. This simply means that the greater part of our troubles are due to social conditions, which we must control as social groups if we are to exercise control. We may turn around and say to a fellow, "You go to work, with your boasted freedom of contract, and work in that lead factory, and when you get lead poisoning we will give you a few little driblets of relief." But the point I want to make is that the average man doesn't have that great freedom of choice about which we talk. A girl in New York or Philadelphia who hasn't been specially trained for some skilled trade takes what she can get—and that isn't very much. Poverty, in a word, is as much a social phenomenon as the accumulation of wealth, the development of law, or any other social institution. As each generation goes by the children must receive a higher and higher degree of training to fit them for the more complex conditions of civilized life.

Now, our responsibility is, first, to get away from the horrible conception that the object of education is to unfit men for work. To get the idea that so-called culture is valueless unless we train the children to do these things they are going to do in later life. Our public school system needs to be turned wrong side up (pardon me, right side up). It is a shame that we shape our curriculum for the three per cent who are going to college, instead of the ninety-seven per cent who are not. (Applause). I assure you you can get as much culture out of a sawbuck and a saw, working on oak limbs, as you can out of a text-book, working on Greek roots. Some of the most cultured men and women I know are those who have had the least of school training, and some of the biggest boors I know are those who have had the most. If we adopt the policy of training our children for what they are going to do we need not waste time over the bugaboo of classical education. I would like to have it so any child might study anything it desired to, and let the choice turn on the question of individual qualities or conditions.

What we need is a higher conception of our responsibility for social welfare. If we cannot go forward to a higher conception of our responsibility to the defectives then it were better to adopt the old method and put them off the earth. If we are going to say that the feeble-minded and the degenerates shall be kept alive and cared for we must go further and realize that this involves a sacred obligation on our part to prevent their reproduction. The possession of property largely depends on social conditions. Those of you who are not wealthy know that if you had had the chance of some of the wealthy men, and been willing to do some things they are supposed to have done you might have had more of this world's goods. It is a theoretical possibility that the impractical school teacher might have gathered more shekels in some other occupation. We must do for the children of to-day what the generations gone by did not do, and did not need to do for their children. When I say for their children I refer to the children of the despised negro as much as to the children of the Four Hundred. There are some who are afraid this world is going to stop when the old American stock has refined itself to such a degree that it reaches the vanishing point. I do not share that fear at all. I am willing to see the incoming groups, provided we give them our ideals of life and the training to enable them to carry on the civilization that our fathers labored to establish in this country. But it depends on what we are going to do for the children; not merely for the homeless child, but for the children in the home, to train them to take their part in the days to come.

We have in the University of Pennsylvania an honor pledge signed by students taking examinations, which reads: "I pledge my word of honor that I have neither given nor received any aid in this examination." A son of one of our wealthy men wrote it one day as follows: "I pledge my word of honor that I have neither given nor received any information in this examination." When we examined his papers we heartily agreed with him. I feel that I am in the position of that boy, that I haven't given much information. If, however, I have left one thought with you, that the problems of heredity will never be affected by changing the environment; the problems of heredity can only be solved by controlling marriage—by no means an easy matter. The problems of the environment are largely under our own control. Our responsibility with reference to heredity is to stop the reproduction of the unfit. Our responsibility toward the environment is to see that each child, of whatever race or previous condition of servitude, in America or elsewhere, has a chance to come into the inheritance of the race, not merely with reference to its literature and culture, but with reference to the great primal factors on which every people must depend, the control of the physical world, the production of the material goods, which are the basis of all life.

Applause.

Col. E. P. Gould: I think the best way to thank the doctor is, as an Association, to invite him to our next meeting, and give him all the time he wants, and I make that as a motion.

The motion is adopted.

Mr. Smith (Chester) here read the following paper, "The National Curse, Intoxicants; Results and Causes of Pauperism, Suicide, Insanity, and Feeder to Our Orphanages."

PAPER BY MR. SMITH.

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen of This Convention.

At the last hour I have been requested to prepare a paper on the most important subject before us to-day in a moral, social, and economic sense. I feel my inability as I never have felt it before in undertaking to treat so very important a subject.

The National Curse, Intoxicants, Results and Cause of Pauperism, Suicides, Insanity, and Feeder of Our Orphanages, all this and much more. Intoxicants, yes, yes. They invade the best homes and leave behind desolation in every form; widows, orphans, crime of all classes. This is an age of conservation. Prohibiting the sale of intoxicating drinks is more closely identified with a sound conservation policy than are the laws prohibiting the wantom destruction of the forest. Woodman spare that tree is a fine sentiment, indeed, but not near as fine or important as, Brewer spare that youth.

Half a century ago slaves were worth $1,200 in this country from a purely economic point of view, and as a National resource, good clean healthy well educated American boys should be worth much more. If you will stop for a moment and think how many of them are annually ruined and utterly destroyed by the saloon and its influences you will be so appalled that you must at least begin to appreciate the great evil effected by this National curse. Mothers, fathers, what is the value of a boy? Is it worth $1,000,000 to save him from this National curse? Yes, if he is your boy or my boy.

If you think this is not a business proposition figure carefully on the annual revenue derived from your saloons and see how far it will go to meet your losses of boys. Alone through the criminal institutions which are fostered under the wing of the grog shope—for I assert that the brewery is originally and the saloon ultimately the spawning place for the gambler, the prostitute, the robber, the wife-beater, and finally the murderer. Gambling and the house of prostitution are so closely allied with the saloon that when the latter is compelled to move out of a community the other must go with it, as they have done in the State of Kansas. Can we unite and defend the fair name of this grand old Commonwealth and the good names of our sons and daughters by wiping out this greatest of all evils by prohibiting the sale and use of intoxicants? Prohibition is not a new theory, it is as old as the abuse of intoxicants. Eleven hundred years before Christ an Emperor of China decreed that all grape vines be pulled up by the roots and burned to ashes. China has been a sober nation ever since. Centuries before Christ Lycurgus, the great law giver of his people, did precisely the same thing in Greece. The Carthaginians prohibited drinking in their army 300 years before the Christian era. Draco in his laws made drunkenness a capital offense. All through history you will find it, and wherever it was observed the nations became great and the people more virtuous.

There is nothing radical or unreasonable in helping a weak man to carry his week's wages home to his wife on Saturday night. There is nothing fanatical in enabling her to send her children to school with good clothes and shoes, and a good dinner in their little basket. I feel convinced after an experience of almost sixteen years in the care of the wrecks of the rum traffic that more than seventy-five per cent of all the dependent and deficient and criminal classes are subjects of this great evil. Follow up the young man who begins to drink intoxicants. See his downward course, lower and lower does he sink until he finds a drunkard's grave or a convict's cell. Let us halt for a moment. Let us look into the hearts of each other. We are banded together for what? To care for our unfortunate and dependent classes. Why should we spend so much time putting forth such a great effort? Will you pause for a moment and reflect? Why? Why not put forth our best effort in removing the great cause of crime and pauperism and the creation of mentally deficient subjects? I am sure with the proper effort of the good people of this great Commonwealth and the removal of the saloon and the rum traffic, in a very few years our dependent cases would materially decrease. Let me quote to you Charles M. Sheldon, the world's famous clergyman and author. "Constitutional prohibition has done more than any other one thing to make Kansas the garden spot morally of the universe. It has educated thousands of the finest young men and women to abhor intoxicating liquors as they would abhor any other kind of sin and crime. It has helped educate the entire population in ways of sobriety and sober, healthy thinking and conditions and has raised the entire moral tone of the State to the highest level of citizenship. Prohibition in Kansas is no question mark, but a permanent fact. The saloon and all that goes with it in Kansas is deader than Pharaoh's army."

Prohibition was never before so popular in Kansas as now. After a thirty years' trial its effects upon all phases of society's welfare has been helpful. wholesome, and uplifting. Something of its beneficent influences upon society may be discerned in the official statistics disclose that at the end of the last fiscal year twenty-eight county poor farms were without inmates, eighty-seven had no insane patients, and fifty-four had no feeble-minded inmates. Twenty-one counties had no convicts in their penitentiaries, thirty-six had no prisoners serving sentences in their county jails, and sixteen counties were without a prisoner serving a sentence in any institution.

SAMUEL WICKERSHAM

Statistics show that Cook County, Illinois, furnishes more insane to the hospitals and the institutions for the insane than the total population of all the Kansas charitable, correctional, and penal institutions combined.

At the conclusion of the last paper, which was received with applause, Mr. Smith read the following Memorial on the death of Samuel Wickersham:

MEMORIAL ON SAMUEL WICKERSHAM.

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen.

It becomes my sad duty to bear testimony in my feeble way to the worth of our departed brother and co-laborer. Not in many years has our community been more deeply shocked than when, on Tuesday evening, September 9th, word was flashed over the telephone telling that Samuel Wickersham was dead. A sadness and a hush fell upon the neighborhood as one whispered to another that same sad message: "Samuel Wickersham is dead."

His public life and business career have been felt for good and made their impress in a greater or lesser degree upon nearly every individual in Avondale and vicinity. He was one of the few men who spend their entire lives upon the farms upon which they are born. He never lived at any other than the one bright spot that was always home to him. He was born in 1844 and received his education at the Millersville State Normal School. In 1889 his public career began, he having been elected that year a Director of the Poor. He served in that office with much ability, fidelity, and wisdom, till February 1, 1902, when, because of his many and various duties, he felt himself compelled to refuse a re-election as a member of our board. His counsels were always wise and consistent, but firm. Since he ceased to be a member of our board we have missed him much, but he will be missed most sorely by all classes in his home neighborhood; more so than any other man in that community, because in his various public positions, as well as in his private life, he was helpful to so many.

He became President of the Avondale National Bank at the time of its organization and continued at the head of that prosperous financial institution till his death. The records of that bank stand as a monument to his financial ability. As Secretary of the Londongrove Building & Loan Association since 1889 he was in a position to advise and to assist many in owning their own homes, and these opportunities he gladly accepted.

He was called to a number of positions of trust and guardianship as a Director of the Kenneth Square Trust Company. He was a power in the upbuilding of this new financial institution. He was an honored member of the Society of Friends, being a Trustee, and also the Superintendent of their first day school of New Garden Meeting. He was also a member of the Educational Committee of the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. Few men could be missed more from their labors and from the pleasant companionship of their associates than our departed friend and brother, Samuel Wickersham. His life has furnished us an example of the highest type of true manhood.

The Convention was favored with more music by the young ladies.

Col. E. P. Gould (Erie) offers the following resolution: "Resolved, that the thanks of the Convention are due to our worthy President, for his faithful and earnest interest in this meeting and for his faithful and impartial and pleasant manner in presiding as the President of our Association," and moves its adoption.

As a matter of courtesy Col. Gould himself puts the motion to the vote of the Convention and it is unanimously adopted.

Col. Gould also moves that the new President be authorized to appoint all of the standing committees for the coming year.

The motion is agreed to.

Col. E. P. Gould here read the following paper: "Legislation Needed in Behalf of the Charities of the State," which was received with applause:

PAPER BY MR. GOULD.

"Legislation Needed in Behalf of the Charities of the State."

The subject assigned me by the Program Committee is one that gives much lattitude, and enables me to say almost anything that is deemed important. The fact is that one, in considering this question, hardly knows whether or not it is best to recommend any new legislation affecting the charities of the State. There are now so many statutes that are ignored, or interpreted by those whose duty it is to enforce them, to suit their own interests or convenience that I sometimes think it would be better to try to have the laws already on the statute books rigidly enforced in the spirit and intent of those who enacted them rather than try to remedy matters by the enactment of new laws.

It must never be forgotten that human nature is about the same the world over, and that selfishness is just as often found in those who dispense charity, as among those who receive it. The real need is some sure way of selecting large-hearted, broad-minded and unselfish men and women to enforce and carry out the laws governing the administration of our charities. Could we by law compel the selection of such persons to administer our charities, then the question could be easily solved. Where the people select their dispensers of charity the peculiar fitness of the person so chosen is in most cases about the last thing thought of by the voter. Sometimes an inexperienced, but in reality a very good man, is selected, and he soon becomes interested in rightly and intelligently performing his official duties, but such are exceptions to the general rule. A great proportion of men so chosen are far more interested in finding out how they are to be benefited by the office they hold than how they are to benefit those depending upon them. For this reason I believe that it would be a great step forward if all dispensers of public charity were appointive. Just where this appointive power should be located, I do not indicate; but wherever it may be placed it will work for the improvement of the system.

In some of the poor districts of the State the Directors are now appointed by the Court and where this is done a far better average standard of Directors is maintained; and what is far more to be desired is the fact that when a Director so appointed shows by the manner in which he administers his office that he is peculiarly fitted for it, and unselfishly devotes himself to his duties, he is rarely permitted to leave his office, but is reappointed as long as he will serve, while efficiency plays a very minor part in the retention of a good man elected by the people. An unwritten rule of rotation supplants him with a new and untried man. Therefore, while I am well aware that my recommendation is not a popular one, yet I earnestly recommend that all dispensers of public charities be made appointive.

There are nearly 300 hospitals and homes in Pennsylvania which are not under State control to the support of which the last Legislature appropriated nearly $6,000,000. One would naturally think that so large an expenditure of the funds of the State would be made only after the most careful investigation of those institutions as to their needs, the kind of work they severally do, the general management of each by someone representing the State, and the Legislature furnished with a full and complete statement of each and every one of these institutions upon which to base the amount of help the State is to give to each of them. If this should be done then it would not be necessary for the Appropriations Committee to visit the various hospitals and homes applying for aid; except it be alleged that the report furnished is unfair or prejudicial. In such cases it would be the duty of the inspection officers to show that they were faithfully and impartially performing their duties. It is not necessary to recommend any new legislation on this subject. The laws now on the statute books authorize all that is necessary to be done. The real need is to devise some way to compel officers, not superficially, but rigidly to perform the duties belonging to their respective offices.

In my opinion the whole system of supervising our charitable and penal institutions is wrong. Theoretically it is very fine to assume that a certain number of distinguished citizens of the State will willingly and without compensation devote their time and ability to looking after the welfare of the wards of the State. On this theory the Board of Public Charities of the State was created. No one, so far as I know, questions the character or ability of the members of that board. But they never have, and we have no right to expect that they ever will, neglect their large and diversified personal interests to attend to the cares and duties of the board. In the main they appoint others to do most of the work. Then, too, one hesitates to criticize a public official for any neglect of duty when it is known that he receives no compensation for his services.

While I have no criticism to make of any member of the Board of Public Charities, yet I do say that in my opinion the whole system is faulty and inefficient. As a remedy for this I would recommend that a Department of Charities and Corrections be established in the State. That the department officers be given fair compensation for their services, and that they be held to a strict accountability as to the manner in which they perform the duties imposed upon them. They should be required to furnish to the Legislature at the beginning of each session a full detailed account of every institution in the State receiving State aid; showing all the facts about each that will enable the Legislature to apportion to each of said institutions the aid it needs as shown by the records given; and thus prevent the disgraceful method of favoritism and the other evils that result from undue influence which now prevails. Log-rolling among the friends of the various hospitals has become a disgrace, and some method should be devised to put an end to it. The people are willing and desirous that liberal support should be extended to all institutions that are striving solely to alleviate the sufferings of humanity, and extend help to the unfortunate wards of the State, but they do not wish that liberality to be abused by the selfishness and greed of those having control of the hospitals and homes.

Reform in the distribution of State aid to institutions not under State control cannot be effected so long as such institutions are not thoroughly and systematically inspected and full reports of such inspections be furnished the Legislature as a basis of the appropriation to be made. This, in my opinion, will never be done until a department is established for that purpose and it be held accountable for the reports it makes.

President Wilson here appointed Col. E. P. Gould and Mr. Fred Fuller as a committee to conduct the new President to the Chair.

Mr. Osche was conducted to the chair and was received with applause. He said:

ADDRESS BY MR. OSCHE.

Ladies and Gentlemen.

In assuming the responsibility as your President for the next year I can only say that I fully appreciate the honor. If the Convention next year is not a sucess I assure you it will not be because Mrs. Williard and myself and others will not try to make it a success.

I think in the smaller towns we have better conventions than in the large cities. I felt very sorry this morning to have so able a man as Dr. Kelsey on the platform with so few to hear him. With such an address as he gave us I think every seat should have been occupied. Next year we will put him on the program when we know the attendance will be large.

I would like to make a few suggestions. I am here as your servant, but having attended the Conventions for eighteen years—and I say this more particularly to the ladies' and children's associations—I suggest that in presenting their papers they try to curtail them some. I heard a remark yesterday as to one paper that it was a pity to have it spoiled by being too long. I hope the ladies will not feel hurt by my saying this, or the men either. I have heard that criticism at every Convention. I will appointed the committees a little later. I thank you for the honor you have conferred upon me.

Applause.

The members of the Convention here arose and received the Benediction from the Rev. Evor Evans, of the Congregational Church.

President-elect Osche: I now declare the Convention adjourned to meet in Indiana next year.

CHESTER COUNTY CHILDREN'S AID SOCIETY.

The Chester County Children's Aid Society continues to hopefully labor for the uplifting of dependent and neglected children. Evidence is multiplying on every hand to show that interest is increasing in this humanizing work.

The active membership of our society for the past year has been 220. To our little flock 34 children have been added. Under our supervision there are 171 county wards; in free homes at present, 135; in boarding homes, 36.

In our supplementary work 12 names are enrolled. These do not become a public charge, and we are unable to chonicle the many helps bestowed in this line of our efforts. Mothers are encouraged to struggle onward and keep close and near their own little ones.

In order to adjust each case separately requires forethought, afterthought, and boundless patience. The efficient Superintendent and Matron of the home and our most worthy Board of Directors of the Poor have been turly helpful through all the years of this work. Their wise judgment, good counsel, kindness and sympthy have always been greatly appreciated. We earnestly hope the coming year may bring into this ever-widening field of labor fresh thought, renewed courage, and greater patience, seeking earnestly for that deeper wisdom which never fails to guide aright.

THE BOYS' INDUSTRIAL HOME.

Extract from Superintendent's tenth annual report of the Boys' Industrial Home, Oakdale, Allegheny County:

During the year ending September 30, 1910, we had under our care for a longer or shorter time, 283 boys, received as follows:

In the Home October 1, 1909	138
Through Juvenile Court, Allegheny Co., homeless or neglected boys	59
Through Juvenile Court other counties, homeless and neglected boys	20
Through friends	33
Through church and chariety workers	25
From other institutions	8
Total	283

How Accounted For—Returned to friends, 92; placed in homes, 35; transferred to other institutions, 5; ran away, 7; in the Home October 1, 1910, 44; total, 283.

Religious Preference—Methodist Episcopal, 56; Presbyterian, 45; Catholic, 27; Lutheran, 25; United Presbyterian, 18; Jewish, 13; Episcopal, 10; Baptist, 10; Christian, 7; other denominations, 17; no preference, 54; total, 283.

Health of Boys—Since the work began, a little over ten years ago, we have cared for 1,126 boys. We have never had a death among them, and little sickness. Except for a few cases of measles last spring, we have never been quarantined.

More Room Needed—During the past year we have refused admission to over 250 needy boys for lack of room. We have 365 acres of land, but to accommodate more boys we must have more buildings. The plan we propose is to build cottages accommodating about 25 boys each. We will do this as soon as we have the money.

Thirty-seventh Annual Convention

OF THE

ASSOCIATION OF

Directors of the Poor and Charities

Of the State of Pennsylvania

HELD IN

THE COURTHOUSE, INDIANA, PA.,

October 10, 11, and 12, 1911.

The Thirty-seventh Annual Convention of the Directors of the Poor and Charities of Pennsylvania convened in the courthouse at Indiana, Pa., on Tuesday morning, October 10, 1911, at 9:30 a. m., and after half an hour spent in registering and forming acquaintances, etc., the convention was called to order by President H. W. Ochse, of Etna, Pa.

In the absence of the Normal School Orchestra and Glee Club, who were on the program for this hour, the delegates and visitors were delightfully entertained by Prof. G. R. King, who gave two songs, one being in response to a hearty encore.

President Ochse extended the thanks of the convention to Prof. King.

Prayer was offered by the Rev. Lewis Hay (the delegates all rising) as follows:

Heavenly Father, and Jesus Christ our Lord, we come to Thee rejoicing in the acknowledgment of Thy manifold goodness to us. We give Thee special thanks, oh God, that in Thy loving providence Thou hast led this representative body to meet in our city—this body which represents so deeply and so truly the spirit of Jesus. We come to Thee, oh God, in this opening meeting of this convention praying that Thy blessing may rest upon the work of this Association. We give Thee thanks for all Thou hast done through them, in the amelioration of suffering. We thank Thee for this great cause. We pray that this may be only the dawning of better things to come. We pray that Thy holy spirit may be present in all the work of this Association, and that all its work may be guided by Thy counsels. Grant, oh Father, that many may be led to co-operate with them in their great work and that from this convention may go out an inspiration that will fill the whole State. We pray that all that is said and done may be blessed of Thee, that it may be used in the building up of better conditions for the poor and the destitute. We ask all this to Thy honor and Thy glory, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

Mr. George Feit, of Indiana, was introduced by President Ochse and responded as follows:

ADDRESS OF WELCOME.

Ladies and Gentlemen of the Associated Charities.

The citizens of Indiana are glad to have you with them. We want you to feel that the town and its people are very much at your service. If you want to make us happy you will enjoy yourselves; you will kindly make yourselves at home, and help yourselves. If there is anything you want and don't see, ask for it. Whatever is ours is yours. We want you to like Indiana and its people. We know a lot of good things about ourselves and about our town, but it is written "Charity vaunteth not itself; is not puffed up." We feel that we must be charitable. So we must leave you to discover for yourselves all the good things about us and the things that are worthy of commendation, and for our shortcomings the mantle of true charity must cover the multitude of our sins.

We are glad that you have selected us, out of the many grand towns of this great Commonwealth, to be your host. We hope your convention will be pleasant and profitable. Pleasant to you and to us, and profitable to those who are the objects of your bounty. We realize the magnitude of the work in which you are engaged. We have some idea of the problems that must be solved. We know that your work is not all poetry and sentiment; that the problems with which you are confronted are for the most part hard and practical and unlovely, but we feel that you are constantly striving toward an ideal, and constantly approaching nearer to it, and we assume that ideal to be something like this—the administration of all the forces that aim to minister to God's poor, incompetent, and criminal in such a manner that the right help shall be ministered to every helpless one, the right inspiration and stimulus to every wayward one, to the end that all human wretchedness that may be healed by human help and kindness may have help and healing, and that the whole work may be inspired and directed by that spiritual charity so nobly defined by the Apostle Paul.

We believe your convention will speed the coming of the day of which the poet dreamed when he wrote—

> "In silence
> Steals on soft-handed charity,
> Tempering her gifts that seem so free
> By time and place,
> Till not a woe the bleak world see,
> But finds her grace."

We honor you practical workers in charity for the work you have done and for the good you are doing. We feel sure that through your efforts the sum total of human happiness has been increased, and that through your perseverance the sum total of human misery will from year to year grow less and less. No doubt it may still be said that "man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn," but it is comforting to know that there are so many men and women who, moved by divine love and pity, aspire to wipe away the tears of all the poor and weak and wronged. So we welcome you, not only for your own sakes, but for the sake of the noble work in which you are engaged; for the sake of the wretchedness which you have helped; for the sake of the homes you have saved; for the sake of the boys and girls you have taken from the paths that lead to vice and degredation; for the sake of the blind and the lame and the feeble-minded who are your wards; for the sake of unborn generations of the unfit and unfortunate whose lives will be made better and happier by reason of the power and inspiration that will go out from this convention here in old Indiana.

Ladies and gentlemen, in the name of the citizens of this town and community, I extend to you a most cordial welcome.

The remarks of Mr. Feit were received with hearty applause.

Mrs. S. J. Telford, of Indiana, was here introduced and gave the following address of welcome to the Ladies' and Children's Aid Societies, which was received with applause:

ADDRESS OF MRS. TELFORD.

Mr. President, Ladies, and Gentlemen.

After listening the the earnest words of welcome to the men of this convention, representing as you do many phases of charitable and humane enterprises, I can very sincerely complement that welcome.

Your influence as an Association, and your individual endeavor, has left an impress upon our whole Commonwealth that is slowly but surely moulding into legal enactment statutes of blessings.

Generous as our welcome is to the men of this convention, yet they do not stand alone in devotion to the causes of humanity which your Association represents.

I see before me women not less devoted.

I have gleaned, from the proceedings of your former annual conventions that women have not only encouraged by their presence, but have entered deeply and with courage into your discussions.

Your present program leads us to anticipate that in this convention she is ready to supplement all your righteous efforts.

I have the honor and pleasure of extending to the ladies of this convention a welcome to our town.

You will perhaps miss much that you have enjoyed in other convention towns, but you will find here an interest in and an appreciation of your work, of which we are not igorant.

You must know that your honorable Vice President, Mrs. Sue E. Williard, is one of us. She has given her life to those most in need of help and most responsive—the children.

As an official of the Children's Aid Society, and as the strong right arm of the Juvenile Court, this woman has shown to us what may be accomplished through a consecrated and unselfish life. The mission of the Children's Aid Society is altruistic.

You have been and are the good Samaritan in the lives of many children fallen by the way. Christ's illustration of love for humanity—a picture of His own life—His question and yours:

Can I do anything for you?

Can I share your burden?

Can I relieve you of your suffering?

Ladies of the convention, we appreciate your coming, and trust that your stay may be pleasant and your sessions profitable. We feel the uplift of your presence, and I am sure that this meeting will be a fine vision of the future in practical achievement.

ONE OF THESE DAYS.

Say! Let's forget it! Let's put it aside!
 Life is so large and the world is so wide,
Days are so short and there's so much to do,
 What if it was false, there's so much that's true!
Say! Let's forget it! Let's brush it away
 Now and forever—so what do you say?
All the bitter words said shall be praise
 One of these days.

Say! Let's forget it! Let's wipe off the slate,
 Find something higher to cherish than hate.
There's so much good in the world that we've had
 Let's strike a balance and cross off the bad.

Say! Let's forget it, whatever it be;
Let's not be slaves when we ought to be free
We shall be walking in sunshiny ways
One of these days.

Say! Let's not mind it! Let's smile it away!
Bring not a withered rose from yesterday;
Flowers are so fresh by the wayside and wood.
Sorrows are blessings, but half understood,
Say! Let's not mind it, however it seems;
Hope is so sweet and holds so many dreams;
All of the sere fields with blossoms shall blaze
One of these days.

Say! Let's not take it so sorely to heart,
Hates may be friendships just drifted apart;
Failure be genius not quite understood;
We could all help folks so much if we would!
Say! Let's get closer to somebody's side,
See what his dreams are and know how he tried;
Learn if your scoldings won't give way to praise
One of these days.

Dr. Lewis Srodes, of Woodville, responded to the address of welcome. He was received with applause and said:

ADDRESS OF DR. SRODES.

Mr. President, Citizens of Indiana, Ladies and Gentlemen.

Should a claim to just a little modesty be permitted, it would justify a reluctance on my part in accepting this assignment. The response to the addresses of welcome that I have given in so many of the past conventions that were loaned to me by Mrs. Lindsey (whom I hope the citizens of Indiana will have the pleasure of meeting) have been used so often that I didn't dare to use them again, and the honor of responding to the address of welcome in Indiana has brought up such a flood of recollections of school days—and memories of school nights, with the pillow fights, the visits to the ice cream parlor that used to be near the entrance to the Normal School, has made it imperative that I institute a change at this time. It must be understood, however, that the good citizens of Indiana will not convey to Miss Leonard the idea that I am about ready to confess all—only that the days and nights I spent in Indiana at the State Normal were among the most pleasant and profitable in my life.

The problem that we bring with us is not a new one and its solution is about as easy as that of perpetual motion; nor is its solution the object of this Association, but instead of striving for what (though it might be ideal) is impossible, we can apply such methods as have been found to be entirely practical and avail ourselves of such features of the work of others that has shown results that are good in the cause of charity, has lightened the load of poverty, brightened the path of the unfortunate and brought the attention of the fortunate to the fact that Nature will demand a full return in striking a balance when the accounts for immoderate living are settled.

College, church, and State are looking in the same direction, and they are seeing more clearly to-day than ever before the force and truth of the following declaration: "For the poor shall never cease out of the land, therefore, I command thee, saying, open wide thy hand unto thy brother, to thy poor and to thy needy in the land." Every community hears this command in some way or other during its development. The rural community may only find it necessary to answer this command as to the individual, but the village, the town, the city, and the State will find that, in proportion to their prosperity, the responsibility as to their poor must increase.

Fifty years ago $50 would probably have relieved all the poor in Indiana County, but Indiana County has prospered and to-day she finds it necessary to open wide her hand and provide spacious buildings, called her County Home. Fifty years hence she will again tear apart her purse strings and proudly ask you to inspect her Department of Charities, in which will be located different institutions classified to suit the necessities of her sick and injured, insane, feeble-minded, and destitute—and her County Home will be a thing of the past.

This must not be construed as the dream of the idealist, but rather the change of ideas from that of the past to those of the present. What Western farmer dreamed fifty years ago, as he rode to town on horseback, that to-day he or his son would drive his auto over the same course.

The Puritan faith that implanted its feet firmly on the rock at Plymouth filtered through the centuries to follow until Indiana County added hope when she contributed her best blood in the dark days of the 60's in order that this Union might be preserved. And from every part of the great State of Pennsylvania, we come to join with the citizens of Indiana County in her efforts to advance the cause of the greatest of the virtues—Charity. And though Indiana has prospered and progressed, her new County Home would indicate that she knows that this great charity is not only a virtue, but a necessity.

We appreciate your generous hospitality and this Association can testify to the interest of Indiana County in this work by the faithful and efficient services of Mrs. Williard and many other zealous, earnest residents of Indiana County.

Great hopes are entertained that this annual meeting of the Association will mark an epoch in its history and Indiana will mark the place where the Conference of Charities and Correction and the Association of the Directors of the Poor were welded in fact as well as purpose. The biological conscience is being awakened to the possibilities of prevention, and should this meeting of representatives of Children's Aid, Directors of the Poor, and practical charity workers result in broader views and conceptions as to the best methods it will not have been in vain.

Mrs. Florence B. Cloud, of Chester County, responed as follows, on behalf of the ladies and Children's Aid Socities:

ADDRESS OF MRS. CLOUD.

Mr. President, Ladies, and Gentlemen of the Convention.

I am surprised that the committee which made up this program allowed a Cloud to appear on the horizon of this convention so soon; but remember that "every cloud has a silver lining." Mine will be brevity. (Applause.)

On behalf of the ladies of the Children's Aid Society, we accept with pleasure the cordial greetings extended us by Mrs. Telford.

Most of you here to-day are familiar with the work of our organization, so I'll not consume the time with attempting to enter into detail.

We feel, however, that our work stands preeminent among all the various charities of the State.

All mankind's concern is Charity. Charity means sympathy, but sympathy does not count for much unless intelligently directed. So to those who have given their hearts and energies to this charitable work it seems they have given it to one of the most important of benevolent efforts.

It is gratifying to feel that a measure of success has crowned some effort toward elevating and improving the conditions of our unfortunate children, and some of these successes have been beyond the bounds of our greatest hope. Again, some of our cases are complicated and we do our work as best we can and trust the results to "Him who doeth all things well."

The main object of the Chester County Society, and its most important field of labor, is the work of placing children in permanent homes where their environments and the instruction and training they receive will make them good, industrious, self-supporting Christian men and women.

Every child is entitled to the benefit of such surroundings so then condemn no child, even of the most wretched parentage, for who can see what their lives will be twenty or thirty years hence?

I contend that every boy and girl has some good trait or quality, and here is where we, as members of the organization, can see that intelligent or even personal work is done to bring out this bit of goodness or sunshine that has hitherto been dormant, and a glimpse of happiness or sunshine does wonders for the child.

In fact, we all need sunshine—now, I don't claim to be a gleam of sunlight—and we should try to cultivate it.

The majority of persons in the State are deeply interested in our work, and it appeals more and more every year to the humane side of the people.

Again, let me thank you one and all for your charming welcome and we hope a great and deep interest will prevail in all our sessions, and that we will go from this convention with gratitude for the friendly and cheering words we have here heard.

President Ochse: In the language of one of my predecessors, "I am up against the real thing now." (Laughter.)

The President's address, which was as follows, was received with applause:

ADDRESS OF PRESIDENT OCHSE.

Ladies and Gentlemen of the Thirty-seventh Annual Convention of the Association of the Directors of the Poor and Charities of Pennsylvania.

It is needless to say that I heartily appreciate the great honor of being your presiding officer at this convention, and I most respectfully request the assistance of all the members of the Association in order that the business of this convention may be given due and careful consideration.

The hearty welcome that has just been extended to us on behalf of the citizens of Indiana assures me that our presence here is appreciated, and we earnestly request and cordially invite the the people of Indiana to attend and take part in our meetings. The Committee on Program has arranged for and selected speakers of note to address you on all subjects relating to the care and elevation of the poor and unfortunate, and I know their efforts will be pleasing and instructive.

Since our last convention the Legislature of Pennsylvania has held its biennial session, and your President, in company with the Solicitor for the Allegheny County Home, Mr. H. W. McIntosh, made several trips to Harrisburg, met with the different committees, and presented the bills proposed and indorsed at our last convention, but despite our efforts these bills did not become laws, nor were any laws passed benefiting our Association. It seems that only machine measures finally passed, and the Legislature evidently did not consider our laws as "machine made." The Chairman of the Committee on Law, Mr. Gould, was also present at the session, and will doubtless explain in detail in his report the result of his efforts.

It would seem like a waste of your time for me to comment on any subject that is to be brought before this convention, as the able speakers selected by the Program Committee will no doubt enlighten you on the topics for discussion, but there are one or two suggestions that I would like to make.

The first is in regard to the new Association in this State, under the name of the Pennsylvania Conference of Charities and Corrections, which holds its meeting in Pittsburg in November next. I know that the majority of the active members of these two Associations regret this state of affair and would much prefer that only one Association of this character existed, and with the concentrated efforts of all interested in work of this kind, and better and greater work could be accomplished. I would propose as the solution, if, after full discussion, it meets with the approval of the members of this Association, that a committee of three or five be appointed, at the proper time, to meet with the other Association, or a similar committee from said Association, in an endeavor to consolidate, if possible, the two Associations. Dr. Little, President of the Pennsylvania Conference of Charities and Corrections, has promised to be present with us here and to discuss this matter, and I earnestly request our Association to give it careful consideration.

My other suggestion is an oft-repeated one, that of revising and codifying the laws of our State pertaining to poor and insane persons. Those of us who have been actually engaged in this worthy undertaking have many times been impressed with the inadequate and obsolete laws that pertain to our work and the necessity for immediate remedies, and my experience in the legal features pertaining to our work has almost convinced me that it would be a proper step for us to indorse the movement to have established in the State of Pennsylvania a court to be known as that of "Domestic Relations," having jurisdiction over matters, not only as suggested by the name, but over the poor and indigent insane.

During my connection with the work I have noticed some great differences. In former days the important feature of the work was the care of the poor, whilst to-day this has been reduced mostly to outdoor relief and is a difficult branch to take care of successfully in largely populated districts and should be systematized so that the best results may be obtained. In comparison, the most important feature of the work now is the care of the insane.

I have no doubt that ere this you will have knowledge of the fact that I failed to get the nomination at the primary election just held. After holding the office for nine years, the cry was "Give some one else a chance," and another element. Using political parlance, I was double-crossed. But such is the fate of a political officeholder—up this year and down the next, your friends victorious one election, or your opponents the next. And of such is the human race.

My relations with the Allegheny County Home have covered a period of nineteen years, and consequently I look upon the institution almost as a creature of my own, and I cannot but ask your indulgence for a moment to say a word or two about it. We have just completed at Woodville, which is about ten miles from Pittsburg on the Washington Branch of the Pennsylvania Railroad, a group of buildings for the Department of the Poor, at a cost of $533,000, which is complete in every detail, and I do not hesitate to say that it has no equal in this country. These new buildings were opened and dedicated on Saturday, September 9, 1911, and at the exercises there were over one thousand people present. The building, together with the hospital for the insane, Superintendent's residence, tuberculosis camp, stables, dairy, and power plant, make our institution a very complete one, and of which I am justly proud. I cordially invite the members of this Association to visit and make a thorough inspection of our institution at any convenient time, and I feel quite certain that you will consider the time well spent and that your visit will not only be a pleasure to me during the short remaining term of my office, but also to the other Directors of the institution.

I again thank you for the honor you have conferred upon me and assure you that my every wish and desire is for the success of this Association, and that the laudable purpose for which it was organized may be greatly furthered.

We will now proceed with the order of the day.

At the close of President Ochse's address, the Hon. H. Frank Eshelman, of Lancaster, was introduced and read the following very able and interesting paper:

PAPER BY THE HON. H. FRANK ESHELMAN.

Pennsylvania's Laws Pertaining to the Poor and Afflicted; and Her Charities.

Mr. President and Ladies and Gentlemen.

The system of public care for the poor, the insane and the deficient in Pennsylvania and her public charities date from the foundation of the province.

Governmental care of the poor in Pennsylvania had its beginning in the Duke of York laws, adopted at Hempstead, Long Island, in 1664, when the Duke of York owned New York and was also later granted the land which is now Eastern Pennsylvania by his brother, King Charles II.

In 1676, shortly after Pennsylvania became a part of the possessions of the Duke of York, he caused the New York laws to be extended into, and to be enforced within, Pennsylvania (D. of Y. Laws, p 3).

Among those laws was the porvision or law adopted in 1666, providing that each township and town should have eight Overseers of the Poor (do., p 44).

Immediately on Penn's arrival in 1682, in the "Great Law" passed at Chester, it was provided that all persons who fall into decay and poverty and are not able to maintain themselves should make complaint to the Justices of the County Court, who were compelled to make provision for such poor until the next court, and that then the said court should make provision for their future needs (do., p 115).

When Pennsylvania was taken out of Penn's hands in 1693, put under the British Crown, and was ruled by Governor Fletcher as Agent of the Crown, it was provided that a public stock for the support of the poor should be raised by levying six shillings a head on the people and one penny in a pound tax upon their property, and that the poor should be taken care of out of this money before anything else was paid (do., 221).

In 1700 Overseers of the Poor were first recognized, in a law passed that year re-enacting a law of 1693 (2 St. L., p 20). Then came the Act of 1706 (do., p 251), which provided that the Justices and two or more substantial inhabitants of each township, to be elected, should be the Overseers of the Poor of the township, and two or more townships were allowed to join in this establishment (do., 6 251). This act also provided a tax and made parents and grandparents, children and grandchildren responsible for each other's support. The act took in the poor, old, blind, lame, and impotent. The question of who were entitled to relief was to be decided by the Justices of the Quarter Sessions.

Then came the Act of 1718. This act sets forth that former laws were not adequate and allowed imposition upon the public. It required a year's residence to establish settlement of the pauper—that the pauper must wear on the shoulder of his right sleeve a large Roman letter "P" together with the first letter of the name of the county or city where he belonged in red or blue—that on refusal to do this relief would be withdrawn and the paupers might be set at hard labor in the workhouse twenty-one days (3 St. L., p 221).

Then came the law of 1735 (4 St. L., p 266). This act recites that the former laws for the relief of the poor and for punishing vagrants, rogues, and idle persons had not been effectual and that the inhabitants were not secured from being imposed on by rogues. It them provided that any one applying for relief must give full account of his residence for one year in the proper township and of all the particulars as to with whom he lived and the cause of his poverty, etc. It further set forth that the poor were very much increased in numbers and that the several rates of a penny a pound were necessary to provide for them. The act also complained that graft had crept in, viz: that the Overseers had supplied the paupers with provisions out of their own stores and shops and charged the public exorbitant prices and that the Overseers had paid unreasonable amounts to their friends for services done.

It seems that the Overseers encouraged rogues and vagabonds to apply for public support so that the Overseers might profit thereby, for the law also provided that if rogues and vagrants are taken in and cared for that the managers of all concerned shall suffer a fine of twenty shillings (4 St. L., p 266).

Then came the law of 1749, providing that the Overseers of the Poor could take gifts and legacies for the poor and manage the same so as to bring an income. Then followed laws providing that various fines—practically the fines for all minor offenses—should be appropriated toward the expense of taking care of the poor. Then in 1750 came the creation of the Pennsylvania Hospital in Philadelphia, (5 St. L., p 129); but as it was very largely intended for the care of insane persons we will speak of it when we trace up the growth of Pennsylvania's system for taking care of the insane. We will not discuss the Philadelphia poor and insane establishment, etc., except to notice a few of the earliest steps taken. In 1755 there was organized the "Contributers" to the relief and employment of the poor of Philadelphia (7 St. L., p 9). This was a public corporation in the nature of one of our modern charity associations, entitling all who should contribute ten pounds or over to membership therein, etc. About the same time the question of idle and vagabond persons imposing themselves upon the public as deserving paupers came up again; and therefore, a law was passed sentencing them to hard labor in the workhouse (7 St. L., p 78).

The next step in the development of the poor relief of Pennsylvania was the comprehensive Act of 1771 (8 St. L., p 75). This act again complained of the inefficiency of former laws. It provided that the Justices of each township and two or more selected inhabitants should be Overseers, and that in Philadelphia twelve selected men should be Overseers of the Poor. It also provided that these Overseers should get a stock of hemp, flax, thread, etc., and set the poor to work in each township to provide fabrics to be sold for their own support. Power was given the Overseers to contract for the use of a house or lodging, to keep, maintain, and employ the poor of each township, and take the proceeds of their labor and apply it toward their keep. To prevent graft, each township was to elect three Auditors who were to audit all accounts. It also provided that the poor authorities could seize the property of any one deserting his wife and children and take it in trust to manage it for the family's benefit. Then followed the Act of 1777, which was a revival and improvement of the Act of 1771 (9 St. L., p 228).

This was followed by another supplement in 1779, which set out that the rate of poor tax was found entirely too low; and it provided that the Justices of any county, on the application of the Overseers of the Poor of any township should set a poor tax, not over seven shillings six pence a pound on property and not over six pounds a head, on all single freemen (10 St. L., p 32). These figures were high. The act was repealed in 1782. A little later there was an act passed providing that persons married for forty years should be relieved from paying any poor taxes (10 St. L., p 404). At the same time there was an act passed which set forth that extra assessments for the poor were found costly and that thereafter, the county, township, and poor district taxes should be apportioned and assessed according to the last State tax (10 St. L., p 140).

From this time up to the adoption of the Federal Constitution several laws were passed giving many fines to the poor authorities, to be applied to the relief of public paupers of our State.

Philadelphia by this time had her own system of poor relief well established. The State, therefore, proceeded to pass local laws creating each of many of the counties a poor district as a separate public corporation. Lancaster and Chester counties were each erected into such districts in 1798; and particularly a "house of employment" for the poor was provided for in each county, (5 Smith Laws, p 275).

And from 1798 onward, up to 1866, among others, the following counties were similarly erected into poor districts—Dauphin, Franklin, Bucks, Montgomery, and York in 1808, Fayette in 1822, Perry and Berks in 1827, Lebanon and Washington in 1830, Schuylkill in 1831, Columbia, Cumberland, Erie, and Westmoreland in 1839, Green and Lehigh in 1840, Lycoming, Bedford, Allegheny in 1841, McKean in 1843, Juniata, Beaver, Luzerne, Mifflin in 1844, Somerset and Blair in 1847, Wayne, Huntingdon and Tioga in 1850, Crawford in 1851, Montour in 1854, Carbon, Center, and Indiana in 1855, Lawrence in 1856, Lackawana and Mercer in 1860, and Clarion in 1865.

In 1836 (P. L., p 539), there was enacted the first general poor law of Pennsylvania. It applied to all poor districts of our State whether county, township, city or borough, and it provided that every poor district should be compelled to furnish relief and employment to all legally settled paupers, and for these purposes to procure suitable places and stocks of material. It also provided that all male poor may be employed in opening and repairing the roads within the district. Much of this law is in force to-day.

In 1869 was erected the State Board of Public charities (P. L., p 90) with large powers. It was given complete supervision over all places and institutions where the poor, sick, insane, etc., are kept wholly or in part at public expense. It seems that at the time of creating the board the Legislature did not appreciate how important the question of insanity would become; and later experience showed the necessity of arming the Board with greater powers over insanity and lunacy.

We may observe here that this Board has the power, among others, "at all times to look into and examine the condition of charitable, reformatory, and correctional institutions, financially and otherwise" and to "inquire into the methods of government and instruction," the condition of the buildings and all matters pertaining to the usefulness and good management" of the institutions under their care.

In 1876 there was enacted the act to require the Commissioners of each county to erect Poor Houses in all poor districts being counties, where there was no such house for maintenance and employment of the poor, and the Directors were required, upon completion thereof, to receive and employ the said poor (P. L., p 149). This extended only to cases in which counties were poor districts, and was necessary since the adoption of the Constitution of 1873, preventing local legislation. It was a general county poor law. This was supplemented by the Act of 1879, distinctly creating each county a poor district, but not allowing it to affect former local laws, under which in former times many townships were made and remained separate poor districts. The act provided distinctly for employment of all paupers, and that land, buildings, tools, machinery, and a stock of material should be provided for this purpose. It made employment compulsory, and required that the proceeds of the paupers' labor should be applied to the cost of their maintenance. It gave the County Commissioners control of the management and financing of the system and control of the property.

This act, in conjunction with that of 1876, constituted the best general law the State yet had. Its operation was limited because most of the counties had their local laws (and in some counties many of the townships had theirs), giving district Boards of Directors and Overseers of the Poor supreme control of the right to compel the County Commissioners to procure the financial supply which such Directors and Overseers called for.

Then came the Act of 1881, providing that where townships and boroughs were by local laws poor districts, and there was no county poorhouse, the boroughs and townships should build such poorhouses (P. L., p 120).

In 1885 a law was passed allowing Overseers of the Poor to contract for a house of lodging and employment and providing that the poor who refused to work should forfeit all relief (P. L., p 204). This was an amendment of the old Poor Law of 1836.

In 1889 the Commonwealth seemed to recognize that mixture of systems of poor relief in vogue in our State and the Legislature created a commission to revise and codify the laws relating to the poor of Pennsylvania. The commission was ordered to report a bill to be passed into a law at the session of 1891; but no such code ever passed. It is likely that this resulted because so many counties had local laws and were jealous of them and refused to give them up (P. L., p 140).

The same year (1889) the Department of Charities and of the Poor in Cities of the Third Class was created, giving such cities the supervision, care, and management of all almshouses, charities, and relief of the poor in such cities, subject to Councils (P. L., p 192). The object seemed to be to make the cities responsible for their own poor. This seems not to have any operation where counties by local or general law were separate poor districts, since the cities are parts of the counties.

In 1897 was enacted a law allowing the ancient township and borough poor districts to combine and also allowing those not having erected poor houses as required to do by the Act of 1881 to contract with the adjoining county poor district to take care of the poor of such townships and boroguhs, for the same price per capita as it costs such county per capita to take care of its poor (P. L., p 222).

In 1905 was passed the hydrophobia act (P. L., p 92), providing assistance for poor suffering from that disease; in 1907 the act to relieve quarantined persons (P. L., p 285). In 1909 an act was passed giving Auditors, other than Township and County Auditors, the right to audit the accounts of poor districts (P. L., p 113). This would seem to give the County Controller additional power to audit these accounts.

We may now summarize the growth of our poor relief system, as we have just detailed it, as follows: It was in the beginning strictly a township system. This Penn found in force when he arrived. He then put the system partly under the County Court, retaining the township unit feature, the Justices to ascertain what money was needed. When Penn in 1693 lost his government (about two years) a regular poor tax was laid. Later the Justices of the townships were added, making a joint Board of Township Overseers of the Poor. Nearly a score of years later (1718), the system having become corrupt and a mark for imposition, the Court took it under its more complete control. Vagrants and impostors were punished and the poor designated by a sleeve mark. At the same time legal settlement was defined and family responsibility (which was attempted in 1700) was again enforced. About a dozen years later control was again back in township Overseers and genuine graft appeared, so that still later (in 1735) a law was passed to prevent Overseers inducing vagrants to get upon the public, where the Overseers supplied them from their own stores. About 1750 laws giving fines to the keep of the poor began to be passed and the Pennsylvania Hospital for poor and insane was chartered. Ten years later the charity known as the "Contributors to Relief of the Poor" was created by law. Then, in 1771, the first serious idea of compelling the poor to work as a condition to being kept was instituted and punishment for wife desertion was established. The system which this act porvided was also a township system, managed by the Justices of the Peace and elected Overseers. It was amended in 1779 by giving the Overseers the power to compel the Justices to raise the money called for. In this condition the system remained until after the Federal Constitution was adopted.

Then for the next seventy years inroads upon the township system were made by local acts passed, making perhaps three-fourths of the counties of Pennsylvania each separate poor districts and requiring the townships to turn their poor over to the new districts.

Every one of these acts required first of all that the poor kept at public expense must all work and produce toward their keeping. This was as compulsory as that the public give them relief.

In 1836 came the general law still further emphasizing the work-house feature and providing that male paupers should be put to road making, whether they were under county or township care.

Then in 1869 came the great supervisory agent of the State, the Board of Charities, with power to compel almost every other agency to heed and fear them—an agency of our Government, which, if it had the machinery, could crush out all the wastefulness, inefficient management, and graft of the whole system—and a power without which the cumbrous and mammoth system of our State could not run or be handled—since no other efficient or properly equipped agency of supervision exists.

Then came the modern county system established by the acts of 1876 and 1879, which threw power into the County Commissioners' hands that they needed for protection of the county against badly managed finances of the poor system, giving them not only financial but also partly administrative control of the poor relief and making a live Superintendent of the poor district with power and a force of employees (who were compelled to obey him), the responsible head of the institution. This could apply only where no lcoal laws governed—a rather small part of our State. It also dispensed with a Board of Directors.

Then in 1889 effort was made to abolish the fragments of the township, the local act, and the general act systems and codify the whole poor establishment of the State in one system, which failed. So that to-day the hybrid system (with the addition of a third-class city system from which nothing is heard, and a Philadelphia and Pittsburg system) is still in force. It is working fairly well, but is extravagant out of proportion to what the State should expend for the relief of pauperism and out of proportion to the good done.

An early phase of poor relief in our State which the free school system has swept away was that of public education of poor children. Penn provided for this at the foundation of his province, in part. In 1800 a law for such education was passed and again another in 1802. The latter law compelled all teachers of private schools to receive children of the poor at public expense (P. L., p 235). Every township and borough in Pennsylvania were required to ascertain the children whose parents were too poor to pay to have them educated. This was to be done by the Overseers of the Poor, who were to give notice to the parents that such provision was made, and a poor tax was levied for the purpose. In 1804 the law was extended for three years (P. L., p 298). In 1824 the law was amplified by an act providing that each township, borough, and ward should elect three "Schoolmen," who were to receive lists of all poor children between six and fourteen years of age from the Assessors, who were to make the lists. The Schoolmen were to furnishing schooling, books, and visit the schools and see that the pauper children were treated in all respects as children whose parents paid for them (P. L., p 137). This act was repealed two years later. In 1826 the duty was by law put upon the County Commissioners to make annual return of all children educated at public expense. The amount paid for education of the poor of Pennsylvania in 1828 (outside of Philadelphia) was $26,000. Lancaster County paid $6,564.00 (3 Haz. Reg., p 165). All this was set aside by the free school system. I have noticed it here simply as one phase of poor relief, now happily ended. But as late as 1840 there was a law requiring the Directors of the Poor of Cumberland County to fix the time of the schooling of poor children put out as apprentices (P. L., p 748). And in 1843 an act was passed to provide for the education of the poor in the non-accepting school districts of the Commonwealth (P. L., p 77).

We now turn to the Pennsylvania system for the care of the insane and mentally deficient generally. Here, too, Penn found provision made for these unfortunates. The Duke of York law was extended into our province in 1676. The law provided that each township should take care of its "distracted" persons and that several townships could combine to do so (D. of Y., p 58).

Other vague provisions were made by law during the provincial times, but not much was accomplished.

The first effort to alleviate insanity in a public way in Pennsylvania (and especially insanity among the poor) was in the creation by law of the Pennsylvania Hospital in 1750. The act sets out that saving and restoring useful and laborious members of a community is a work of public service and that in "many parts of Pennsylvania there are languishing poor persons in disorder of mind and have no skillful surgeons to cure them." The act then provides that all who subscribe ten pounds to establish a hospital for relief of lunatics and other distempered poor may assemble and elect twelve managers to make rules, etc., for the corporation, and when they have contributed two thousand pounds, the province would furnish two thousand pounds more to build a hospital, etc. (5 St. L., p 129). By 1828 this institution had 887 inmates, the members having reached about three hundred up to 1810 and thereafter rapidly increased (1 Haz. Reg., p 326).

The care of the insane thus, contrary to the care of the poor, started in Pennsylvania as a State function—the care of the poor as a township function.

Following the lead of the Pennsylvania Hospital in 1750, an act was passed in 1841 to establish an asylum for the insane of Pennsylvania (P. L., p 57). The building was to accommodate three hundred patients and $120,000 was to be loaned for the purpose. It was to be governed by nine Trustees, and the Courts of the State were entitled to commit the insane to the asylum; and besides, all authorities having care of the poor were to have authority to send insane paupers to the asylum and pay for the treatment of them. Thus before this time insane paupers were kept with other paupers. In 1845 the Pennsylvania State Lunatic Hospital was created and each county was entitled to send insane thereto in the ratio of their insane population (P. L., p 440). In 1854 a Miners' Asylum was erected (P. L., p 318).

From this time on the creation of State and semi-State institutions for the care and cure of the insane became so various that it would be folly to follow them up.

The next great step in making provision for the insane after the different asylums were created was the creation of the State Board of Charities in 1869.

In its power and duty to examine into the conduct of charitable and correctional institutions receiving State aid, it had power over asylums and hospitals and it did good work along these lines, but needed wider powers along the line of insanity, etc.

From 1869 onward, State hospitals for insane were being established, such as that for the Southeastern District of Pennsylvania, at Norristown, in 1876 (P. L., p 121), and others.

Then, in 1883, came the great boon for the insane of our State in the amendment of the law creating the Board of Charities, and especially in creating within the Board the "State Committee on Lunacy" (P. L., p 21). This act gave the Board supervision over all places or houses where any persons of unsound mind is detained wherever the occupant of the house receives any compensation, and over all houses or places where more than one insane person is detained with or without compensation. Other large powers were given to the Committee on Lunacy of said Board putting the sick and insane completely under their supervision. Later the same year was passed the County Support Act (June 13th, P. L., p 92), which gave the Board of Commissioners of Public Charities the right to transfer any indigent insane person from the county institutions to the State hospitals at not over $3.50 cost a week, of which the county should pay not over $2.00.

Under the act some of the local insane were cared for at home and some in the State institutions.

Thus remained the conditions until 1889, when the county's share of keeping its insane in State hospitals was fixed at $1.75 a week; and power was given the Board of Commissioners of Public Charities, at its discretion, to transfer all indigent insane from State hospitals or asylums back to the almshouses, poorhouses, and prisons of the counties where they belonged (P. L., p 258). This exactly reversed the policy of the Act of 1883 and is known as the County Care act. This policy carried out to its full extent would, of course, require the local authorities to build their own asylums and keep their own insane, and many counties proceeded to do so to their sorrow, since the county will lay out more money per capita, even with the State aid considered, for keeping its insane at home than the $1.75 per week which the county was compelled to pay per capita to State hospitals.

Then came another County Care act of 1895, providing that counties which take care of their own insane shall have contributed by the State the amount that by the act of 1883 was given to State hospitals by the State toward keeping the counties' insane, viz: One-half of the weekly cost, not over $2.00 (P. L., p 321).

Then followed the Act of 1907, providing that where insane are kept in a State hospital, the county where the insane belong shall pay $1.75 a week to their support and the State shall pay the balance, not over $2.50 a week (P. L., p 153). This was followed by the Act of 1909, which provides that poor districts taking care of their own insane shall receive from the State the same allowance given by the State to State hospitals by the Act of 1907, viz: the total expense per capita over $1.75 a week (which the county must pay) the excess, however, not to be over $2.50 per week (P. L., p 533).

This is the situation as it now stands. The counties may take care of their own insane under the supervision of the State Board of Charities, and shall pay $1.75 per week per capita towards their keep and the State will pay the balance, contributing to the county not over $2.50 a week additional. And by the Act of 1889 the Board of Charities can send to the counties and compel them to keep their own insane.

About the only comment to make upon the insane establishment of Pennsylvania is that, from the time that the State awoke to the sense of a necessity to separate the insane from the other poor and to give them treatment such as likely would restore a large number of them, about 1840, it has done a marvelous work. The number of insane is greater than the number of paupers and their case is more serious. This the State realized and early assumed the right, though at the expense of local authorities, to treat them scientifically and to do this, took charge of them while it left the paupers in local care. The State built scores and scores of large and small hospitals and asylums in different sections of the State to treat the different forms of insanity and deficiencies, mental and physical, including the blind, the deaf, and the dumb, and therefore had laws enacted giving it the right to remove from local authorities the afflicted, who needed superior care. It erected a powerful Board of Charities and gave it plenary power and control of the whole question of insanity, lunacy, disease, deficiency, restraint of crime, etc., and power to compel all local authorities and municipalities to yield to it and obey it. The State, finding its institutions overflowing with the thousands of insane and mental deficients, next secured laws to send back to local authorities such as were advisable to be sent back, and finally for over two scores of years has been appropriating immense sums in these latter years, reaching many millions annually, to care for and cure these unfortunates. And in addition to this it now obligates itself to pay not over $2.50 a week per capita to the county and other local poor authorities which take proper care of their own insane.

The seriousness of this situation of the insane cannot be over estimated. The indigent insane supported in whole or in part by the State has more than doubled in the last twenty years. In 1890 the number treated was 7,399, in 1900 it was 11,249, and in 1910, at the end of September, the number was 15,358. The appropriation for the indigent insane rose from $400,000 in 1890 to $2,000,000 in 1910. And during the last twenty-five years the aggregate appropriated and consumed in this one item of State government has been $20,215,000.

The Legislature of 1909 appropriated for the period of 1909 to 1911, for the use of the Harrisburg, Warren, Danville, Norristown, Wernersville, and Dixmont hospitals for the insane, and for the Homeopathic and Criminal hospitals and for the Feeble-Minded and Epileptic Asylums of Spring City, Polk, and Elwyn, and for the Epileptic colony of Oakbourne, and for the Philadelphia Hospital $6,088,966.

For 1911-13 the sum is still larger and it is probable that the appropriations toward State, semi-State, and private purely charitable institutions will reach about $15,000,000 or $7,500,000 annually. That is about the same as has been annually appropriated to the Common and Normal schools of the Commonwealth. The aggregate appropriations from 1850 have reached the sum of $98,000,000.

Besides this the local authorities caring for their insane at home, spend about as much as the State appropriates for the keep of the insane.

Pennsylvania is looking after this tremendous problem of her insane, deficients, and criminals in a manful way—a charity of such magnitude as staggers appreciation. Nearly all of it is committed visitorially or supervisorily to the Board of Commissioners of Public Charities. In their preliminary report for the years of 1911-12 they astound us all. Of State institutions there are twenty-one under their supervision, which for maintenance and buildings will need $6,000,000 for the two years mentioned; semi-State charities, eight which will need $1,500,000; hospitals, 152 which will need nearly $120,000; homes, 111 which will need nearly $1,000,000. And when we consider the fact that local authorities contribute about as much as the State donates to the asylum and hospital needs, and that there are scores more of similar institutions in Pennsylvania endowed so that they do not need public aid, we get some idea of the awful infliction humanity is suffering under the rate at which our rapid, reckless, destructive, nerve-racking, modern life and pace are breaking us down. And with all this we have not covered the field. We are awakening to realize that a whole new establishment is needed. Institutions exist for the care of the paupers, the cure of the insane, weak-minded, blind, the deaf and dumb, the sick, for the correction of the criminal, for the unfortunate and unfathered infants, for children under four years old, for friendless children. But for the help and restraint of the bad boys and girls, the abandoned and destitute children, nothing yet has appeared but the Juvenile Court and the reformatory. Something different from children's homes and almshouses are needed for these. A system of foster-homes, placing in private homes, is needed for these. A young woman's reformatory is needed. More complete control and restraint of imbeciles is needed, especially restraint of procreation. The feeble minded institutions are overcrowded and about 2,500 of the ordinary feeble-minded are mixed in with the insane. These and epileptics should be separated and be put into some industrial plant, so as to become producers. There are 18,000 feeble-minded in the State, 7,000 of them women of child bearing ages.

The burden of the State could be made lighter by extension of county care of the insane with proper appropriation by the State to assist. It would take less public money. All State institutions require more money per capita to care for an insane person than local institutions.

The State of Pennsylvania has come to the point, too, where she must choose between neglecting a large percentage of her insane and unfortunates entirely, or being satisfied with a less expensive care and treatment put upon each. Too many attendants and too expensive equipment is demanded in our modern day to enable all to be benefited. Which shall it be—a fair degree of care and comfort and attendance and treatment of all the insane, thus providing for all, or the most modern and complete care for some, with supernumerary attendants, doctors, and nurses for the benefit of some, leaving a large percentage unprovided for? We cannot do both.

We must make our unfortunates do more work. The advocacy by the President of the Board of Public Charities that workhouses in counties or groups of counties be re-established is excellent. In the old days before polite effeminacy set in and before guards and attendants and nurses became too lazy and independent to do a full day's work and honestly earn their pay, work was gotten out of the poor and insane wards of the State. I have stated earlier in this address and have shown historically that in former times these institutions were workhouses. But now guards and attendants are in uniform and are military-looking fellows, immaculate and afraid to touch dirt or to get any callous on their hands because there is inconvenience in keeping the wards at work. The result is that the quarries opened by paupers fifty years ago gape at the sun, while the demand for crushed stone to make concrete is so great that twenty-five per cent of the demand is forever unsatisfied.

In my own county, where a concrete curb was to be constructed along the jail pavement, 120 feet long, I agreed as Controller to the same being done on proposals for bids, announcing that bidders must specify the price per hour they will deduct for jail labor contributed. The successful bidder allowed ten cents per hour. When the bill came in the gross cost was $201 less $1.20 for jail labor. We had a right to expect a credit of at least $50. But the excuse was that only one of the 100 prisoners in the jail could dig a straight ditch and none could help to mix concrete or wheel stone or sand. The truth is it was too much trouble for the guards to take the men out to do the work and to watch them. It is a sample of the disinclination of paupers and criminal authorities to get work out of the public objects of charity and correction.

As we have just stated, a principal weakness of the public poor, insane, and charity establishments of our State and country is the unproductiveness of the whole system. It does not follow that because one has become a pauper that he has a right to be lazy—nor one who has become old and feeble is justified in being excused from all useful occupation—nor that one who is insane may demand that his mind and hands be idle. Work is a better cure than anything else.

The central ideas in all the old laws establishing poor districts and poorhouses was that they should be "workhouses" or "houses of employment." The very titles of old acts show this. But in modern days this industrial view seems to be dropped and the poorhouse has become a place to hang around till death—a place to sit around and drowse until the end. I never will agree to the idea that those in the poorhouse are entitled to fare better than the worst off of those outside. It is wrong in principle—undeserved. It is an inducement to go there. Pride does not restrain, for the strata of society who land there have little pride.

I know of one institution that in 1910 consumed nearly $90,000, contributing thereto from its farm of about ninety acres $7,000, leaving a net cost of $82,500, paid by the State, the county, and the relatives of the paupers, the sick, and the insane. This is too small an amount contributed toward so immense an outlay.

It seems to me that an unlimited quantity of beans might be grown and which the paupers could shell during the winter, so that instead of buying soup beans, each county might sell 1,000 bushels or more—that garments might be made by the women, not only for the inmates of the almshouse, but for prisoners in the jail, the children of children's homes, the charges of the county boarded out, etc., and all mattresses and bed sheets, towels, and every bit of such articles used in jails, children's homes, etc. Robust insane should do heavy work on the farm and take out stone for market, etc.

I believe that a cottage plan of establishment may be cheaper than great towering buildings, with thick walls, fire escapes, steps, massive engines, etc. And in fact, a system of boarding out a certain percentage of county charges the same as the children are put out, and as outdoor relief is furnished, would in some cases be economical. Practically one-fourth of the cost is salary and much of this would be saved by extending the outdoor system. Coal in a big plant costs fully $10 per head per year. There are families of six or eight warmed a whole year for $20 or about $3 or $4 a head.

As an illustration of the costliness of a central plant, take an instance where the number cared for was about 575 daily, including those cared for outside the buildings and in other institutions—there being 257 insane, 83 hospital patients, 172 paupers, and 63 sick insane, children, etc., boarded out and cared for. The per capita cost per year net was $143.50, or $2.76 a week, and gross $156.50 a year, or $3 weekly. Deducting the cost of boarding and temporary and permanent relief to the 63 cared for out of the buildings, $5,208, we have approximately $85,000 gross consumption by the remaining 512, or $77,300 net consumption, being an outlay of about $3.20 a week gross, or about $3 a week net.

Thus we see that the whole 575 or 512 in the building contributed practically nothing to their support, for, on a wholesale plan, boarding and care can be furnished at $3 or $3.20 a week, especially bed and board of the character to which public wards are entitled.

And the illustration I give is from one of the most carefully and economically conducted institutions of the State.

Let me conclude with these parting reflections:

Inasmuch as the Board of Commissioners of Public Charities has complete supervisory control of financial and administrative management of all our charitable institutions to which public money is appropriated, they should by all means take under their strict care the method of purchasing supplies and compel wholesale competitive buying in all cases and remove these asylums and homes of the unfortunate inmates and the unfortunate public from politics by cutting off the appropriation of public money wherever the most economical system is not arrived at—buying wholesale. The Board has power now to punish or have punished any waste of public money. They ought to have a bureau to take charge of the finances of all these institutions and have the power to determine whether or not to allow instalments of appropriations to be paid until proof of satisfactory and economical expenditure of former instalments has been made. They should have the power to order the discharge of supernumerary employees where an institution is practically overloaded with parasites and sinecures unnecessarily drawing public revenue. This power I think they do have.

I think the Board one of the most excellent agencies in all the maze of governmental functions of Pennsylvania, but I submit they are woefully lacking in their control of the financial economy of our charities. They devote most of their attention to the getting money and little of it as a brake on expenditures. They have their hands full looking after the medical and sanitary and curative and restorative end of the job and not upon the political economy of the system.

I believe also that the Board, as well as all who are in the oversight and Directorate of these penal and charitable institutions, must turn their attention to a fully developed industrial side or we will consume the heart out of the public and all become paupers. There is practically no scientific thought on that phase of Pennsylvania's public penal and charitable system to-day. The workhouse has fallen into decay. The poor, the criminal, the weak-minded, the insane all must help to sustain themselves and help hard. Neither age nor weakness should excuse them. God knows, enough of both aged and sickly people outside who are laboring to support their families. The best public thinkers of our State must work out a plan that will produce results of a great money value—products by the inmates that will offset their parasitic consumption of the public stock without return.

The pendulum of public opinion is again swinging away from boards of directors and boards of inspectors and toward management by County Commissioners and the Court. A jail law abolishing useless jail boards is now on our books. The President of the Board of Charities says Poor Boards are useless. I will not give my opinion on it. I will say that several Judges agree with the President of the Board of Charities. I will also say that the great preponderance of public thought also insists that both jail and poor boards are no longer needed.

Both Judges and County Commissioners have had substantial additions to their salaries and they might as well earn them by some additional duties. As it now is there is division of authority between Commissioners and boards. This is not wise.

If there should come abrogation of Boards of Directors, then the chief concern would be an efficient Superintendent with power to make underlings respect and obey him.

And this brings me to another very vital head. No institution should have two managers—they will antagonize and be jealous of each other. It also makes useless expense. One man should be in supreme control, Steward or Superintendent. All others should be subordinate.

But Pennsylvania has a greater task on hand, that of taking adequate care of the criminals, paupers, insane, delinquent, deficient, wayward, dissolute, deserted, profligate, and other evil-minded, dangerous, disreputable, helpless, outcast, and afflicted wrecks of humanity. Our diseased civilization, with its damnable and extravagant tendencies, its gambling and grafting spirit in everything from marriages to the stocks of giant monopolies—its mad race and rush and nerve-wracking pace—must be purified and be taught to stop making the hordes of unfortunates whom it strikes down and then is not allowed to kill, but must pick up again and try to nurse back to health. The problem is getting too big. Our attention must be turned to preventing rather than to curing. Back of it all we must find the means to make factory laws unnecessary by keeping girls in the home. We must stop dissolving the family by making marriage and divorce both difficult—by reviving family pride and adhesiveness, making it keep its skeletons in its closets and its children at home, by refusing to allow the family to load on the public every inconvenience it desires to get rid of. Our drift is toward Socialism. The central principle of Socialism is that we may all be paupers, or at least public charges.

Old Pennsylvania is a great State. Her laws relating to the poor and afflicted and her charities are a glory and honor to her sons. Her munificence for the worthy objects of restoring the demented and the sick, reforming the criminals, and relieving the paupers are fairly adequate to the serious duty of the uplift which is incumbent upon her. But Pennsylvania has a higher duty than to boast of her charity. The great size of a charity and pauper fund is not a thing to gloat and glory over. They are the registers of the degree of decay and crime and hardship and shortcoming and sin in the body of the people—the cancer on the fair brow of the body politic. Pennsylvania may feel she is doing her duty when she eases the sufferer, but she will merit the "Well done, good and faithful servant," only when she cures the condition which caused the cancer.

Mr. Eshelman's paper was received with applause, and President Ochse said: I am sure that we all congratulate Mr. Eshelman on the magnificent paper that he has given us.

Col. E. P. Gould, of Erie, here addressed the convention on "What Legislation Was Enacted by the Recent Legislature" as follows:

ADDRESS OF COL. GOULD.

In assigning my subject the Program Committee must have intended to introduce a little of the humorous with the more serious features of the convention. When we remember that there were introduced in the last Legislature about 3,000 bills, and that about one-third of them were enacted into laws; and when you consider the subject given me and then turn to the last page of the program and read, "Papers, discussions, and reports will be limited to fifteen minutes," you will understand how great the joke really is.

The lawyers of Pennsylvania have been practicing law all this year without knowing what the law is. The Legislature enacted about 950 different laws, and among them was an act requiring that the Session Laws should be printed in two volumes, one to contain the general laws and the other the appropriation bills.

I was permitted to examine an advanced copy of the first volume a little while last Saturday for the first time, so that you will not expect a very accurate or detailed statement of the legislative work.

I suppose the Program Committee did not expect me to refer to what legislation was enacted, except so far as it related to the subjects that we are interested in, and I will confine myself to that portion of the enactments. There have been local laws passed to which I shall barely refer. The city of Philadelphia has commenced the building of a large institution for the care of the feeble-minded and epileptics in that city, and two local hospitals in the State have by the passage of laws been turned over to the State. Heretofore the acts of Assembly have been numbered from 1 to the end in the order in which they became laws, but by publishing them in two volumes and separating the general laws from the appropriation bills it became necessary to drop out the numbering, and now you can cite an act only by giving the page of the Session Laws on which it is printed. I want to say, to the attorneys especially, and to all others present, that all the influence they can exert should be used to compel the Legislature to chapter the laws passed and require them to be cited in court by the chapter number. I will now call your attention to the following acts of Assembly of 1911:

On page 64 is an act which prohibits the exhibition of immoral pictures.

On page 66 is an act which provides for the burial of unclaimed bodies unfit for anatomical purposes.

On page 103 is a supplement to an act creating a bureau of health in cities of the second class providing for the destruction of buildings dangerous to the public health.

On page 112 is an act which provides that estates passing to adopted children shall not be liable to an inheritance tax.

On page 177 is an act which gives to the mother in certain cases the right to the services of minor children which the father now possesses.

On page 539 is an act which relates to the adoption of adult persons as heirs.

On page 543 is an act which provides that in certain cases the support of minors may be imposed upon the county by the Juvenile Court.

On page 623 is an act which gives to County Commissioners the power to appropriate money for maintenance of indigent tuberculosis patients in any hospital in the county incorporated for the purpose of treating residents of the county for that purpose.

On page 649 is an act which empowers poor law officers, in their discretion to appropriate money to corporations organized to give medical care to paupers injured or sick.

On page 671 is an act which prohibits pawnbrokers from making loans to minors under 16 years of age.

On page 676 is an act which provides for the support of minors who have been or may hereafter be committed to institutions outside of the State by the Juvenile Court.

On page 677 is an act which provides for fire drills in factories where women and children are employed; and

On page 294 is an act which requires fire drills in the public schools.

On page 834 is an act which provides for the erection of Memorial Halls in the several counties at the expense of the public, in honor of the soldiers, sailors and marines of the Civil and other wars.

On page 836 is an act which provides for the disposition and payment of costs in Juvenile Court cases.

On page 854 is an act which provides for the regulating and licensing in cities of the third class of persons boarding, for pay or otherwise, children under three years of age.

On page 927 is a resolution constituting a commission to report a plan for the segregation, care, and treatment of feeble-minded and epileptic persons.

On page 928 is an act which provides for the licensing and regulation of midwives and the practice of midwifery.

On page 959 is an act which provides for the better care, support, etc., of dependent, neglected and incorrigible children under sixteen years of age by giving power to the Court to enforce orders of support.

On page 973 is an act that provides a method of enforcing orders of maintenance.

On page 979 is an act which safeguards life and property in the coal mines of the State.

On page 983 is an act that amends an act to further regulate the ages at which minors may be employed in and about the coal mines of Pennsylvania.

On page 986 is an act which regulates the compensation of Directors of the poor in districts wholly within the county.

On page 1052 is an act that fixes the time of electing Directors and Overseers of the Poor and their terms of office.

On page 1067 is an act that regulates the exhibiting or using of moving pictures, and providing for the examination and approvel of the films, etc.

On page 1090 is an act that abolishes the commission appointed to select a site and build an institution for the feeble-minded and epileptic, which was located at Sping City, Chester County, Pa., and directing the Board of Trustees to complete the buildings and manage the institution.

On page 1111 is an act which authorizes Directors of the Poor to purchase and equip hospitals for the care and treatment of indigent persons afflicted with tuberculosis.

On page 1111 is an act that requires Overseers of the Poor in second class townships, upon petition, to care for and maintain cemeteries to be paid for out of the poor fund.

On page 1119 is an act which prohibits the Legislature from making any appropriation to any unincorporated institution of charity or correction which is organized after the passage of the act.

It is a matter of congratulation that the institution for feeble-minded and epileptics at Spring City, Chester County, has been completed and turned over to the Trustees without any scandal connected with its erection, such as has been so widespread over the location and erection of the Homeopathic State Hospital for the treatment of the insane which was located in Lehigh County.

During the last session of the Legislature I see that appropriations were made to two county branches or auxiliary societies of the Children's Aid Society of Western Pennsylvania. While this shows the push and influence of these local societies, yet it is in my opinion a very bad policy for the auxiliary societies to ask for appropriations directly to them. The better way, it seems to me, would be for the general society to ask for an appropriation, which when obtained should be distributed to the auxiliary societies according to a plan agreed upon, based upon the necessities of each of the subsidiary societies according to the work it is doing.

At the close of Col. Gould's address Mrs. Bowie, Vice President of the Western Pennsylvania Children's Aid Society arose and stated that in two counties the auxiliary societies had obtained appropriations. That this action on their part was disapproved by the general society, and she further stated that both of said local societies were now independent, and no longer connected with the general society.

RESOLUTIONS ON THE FLOOD AT AUSTIN.

Mr. Colborn here offered the following resolutions as to the sufferers from the flood at Austin and Costello, which, upon motion, were adopted:

Whereas, On the 30th of September, 1911, one of the greatest and direct calamities befell the citizens and community of the villages of Austin and Costello, Potter County, Pa., since the terrible disaster of the Johnstown Flood on the 30th of May, 1889, whereby these two peaceful villages were entirely destroyed and almost wiped from the face of the map, and by which more than one hundred lives were swept into destruction, and over six million of dollars of property destroyed and upward of one thousand more people maimed and wounded and left homeless and destitute on account of the great flood caused by the breaking of the dam of the Bayless Paper Company, spreading ruin and devastation throughout the peaceful valley of the Sinnemahoning;

And, whereas, The survivors of this great disaster have been left without homes and without the necessaries and comforts of life, upon the heels of winter. The suffering of the good citizens must have been and will be severe in the extreme, while sickness and pestilence follow in the wake of this terrible disaster; therefore, be it

Resolved, By the Association of the Directors of the Poor and Charities of Pennsylvania, in convention met, that we do most sincerely and with saddened hearts extend our greatest sympathy and lament for those who have been bereft of fathers, mothers, sisters, relatives, and friends, whose lives without warning were wiped out and went down into a watery grave.

Resolved, That we petition the God of the heavens and earth, and the Father of Goodness, Love, and Mercy, that He who doeth all things well, who hath blessed our goodly land and led the inhabitants through trials and distresses, that we beseech Him in this, the time that a great calamity has befallen the citizens of these two villages, that He will look with mercy upon them; that He will comfort the hearts of the living who have been bereft of parents, brothers, sisters, and friends; that He will heal the broken hearts and bind up the bruised spirits; that He will bless them in store and stay all future pestilence or diseases that may follow in the wake, and will, in His love and mercy, gather together those that have perished into His everlasting kingdom, into that mansion not made by hands, eternal in the heavens.

Resolved, That we recommend to the various Boards of Directors of the Poor and charitable institutions and Children's Aid Societies that they cheerfully make liberal donations toward relieving the suffering of these people and that they open their homes for the widows and orphans.

Resolved, That we petition the Governor of the Commonwealth to make provision for supplies to these people, and to the citizens of the Commonwealth to contribute money and other articles to care for them during the winter, and to restore shelter and homes for the future.

Resolved, That these resolutions be published in the proceedings of this convention and in many newspapers of the State; that one copy be sent to the Governor of the Commonwealth and to the Burgesses of the towns of Austin and Costello.

Mr. Colborn: In token of our respect, I move that this convention do now adjourn.

The convention was here adjourned until 2 o'clock p. m.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The convention was called to order by President Ochse at 2 p. m.

PAPER BY PROF. BRIDENBAUGH.

Mr. President and Members of the Association of Directors of the Poor and Charities of Pennsylvania:

Having been absent from the splendid meetings of this honored and influential Association for four consecutive years, I am very glad to be here and take my humble part in your deliberations.

Adequate relief embraces a wide field, and has been discussed by many worthy and able members of this convention in its various aspects at many former meetings.

When men, women, and children are admitted to the almshouses of the State they are expected to be furnished with such help as each case merits and demands. Those who are ill from diseases, which commonly afflict mankind, should certainly be classed as hospital cases, and should have furnished them in unstinted measure, the care and help of physician, nurse, medicine, food and clothing, and everything that helps to alleviate suffering and brighten the last days upon this beautiful and Christian land.

But great care must be exercised by all those concerned in the management of almshouses so that the patients do not become impostors and that they do not linger in and around the institution after they have been cured or nursed back to partial health, unless they are such patients as are without home and friends and are to remain in the almshouse until they die.

There is a respectable class of citizens who come to our almshouses for a short time because they have been unfortunate through loss of remunerative employment or sickness or disease or death of some member of the family, who are eager and willing to help do the work of the farm, garden, and the chores in and about the house, and because of their misfortune they deserve the sympathy and help in aboundant measure of the Directors of the Poor and all persons who have anything to do with the distribution of relief.

But the shiftless class, the criminal, the licentious, the loafer, the drones of society, the downright impostors of the community who delight in fakes; the gamblers, thieves, rovers; these and all such should have the line drawn upon their mandatory demands for relief and should not be allowed to rest and feast upon the bounty of the taxpayers of the county, but stern discipline and partial relief only should be given them.

Unfortunately a misguided, sympathetic public sentiment frequently interfers greatly with corrective measures. People who eagerly and willingly give a listening ear, and credence to tales of woe and false statements about the food, clothing and care of the almshouse, and base their conclusions on such information without any proper investigation—these are the people who frequently condemn the management of almshouses and block the plan of inside relief.

The road leading to the almshouse is too easy and soft for the roving inmate, the one who goes out in the summer and works for pay and spends his money for intoxicants, who sells even his clothing or trades off anything he has for drink, and perhaps who has been on the register list of a score of almshouses and who condemns the management of all of them, these fellows should be listed separately, and their names be published, and every almshouse in the State should be furnished with a copy, and the managers of our almshouses should get together and formulate rules and regulations enabling them to fearlessly handle this class of impostors.

The physically disabled and mentally infirm we always have in our almshouses and they should have all the comforts and care that a charitably disposed people will willingly have furnished for them.

Adequate relief as applied to outside relief or what is commonly known as outdoor relief is attended with more difficulty than relief furnished in the various institutions of the State. The methods of treatment of the applicants and the amount of help furnished is not by any means uniform, but varies in proportion to the number of Poor Districts in the State.

In many districts thorough investigation of applications for relief is not made. Too many societies, agencies, and officers are engaged in furnishing relief at the expense of the taxpayers, and the relief furnished too often helps to educate a large class of dependents who will not exert themselves to provide shelter, warmth, and food for those dependent upon them.

I am convinced that the Directors of the Poor of this State should band together in the study of more uniform methods of distributing relief, and make a greater effort to correct the cause of destitution than to be merely satisfied, as in many instances, in simply issuing orders for food, clothing and fuel. We are a magnanimous, sympathetic people and no Director of the Poor willingly refuses to do his full duty in distributing the funds entrusted to his care. We believe that the work of this annual convention should be supplemented with district meetings throughout the year where Directors of the Poor and managers of almshouses would come together and discuss methods of work and cooperate in recommending corrective measures for relief.

Quotation from Mr. Smith:

"We, in Chester County, take a different view as to outside relief from many of the counties. I don't think we have spent $500 in any one year in the last sixteen years for outside relief, and we have a county of 100,000 people. We believe that to help the average family who apply for relief is making paupers of them and their children. Unless it is a very good family and a very exceptional case, we withhold all relief. A family that will apply for relief from year to year you had better break up and put the children into homes. Most of the people who come to you seeking relief will refuse to go to the County Home and will tell you they can live without relief. We will aid an old man and his wife, or a widow, living with her daughter, possibly."

Quotation from Mr. Snyder:

"I represent a district that gives outdoor relief, in Philadelphia, and I always make it a rule to go and visit the family and find out about it. We have a Ladies' Aid Society and Relief Association, and if you are not very careful these people will impose on you and go to both societies. I have been to places where they were living nicely, and when I told them I would send them to the almshouse they didn't want any relief. One day a woman came to my office and with her a neighbor woman who told me this woman had nothing to eat, and I gave her an order for a dollar's worth of stuff and she went out to the gate and sold that dollar order for twenty-five cents and went into the theater and sat there nearly all the afternoon. In some of our meetings it has been said that they say nothing about the Director who has just taken his position. I know that a man who has no knowledge of giving out poor relief is imposed upon and it takes some time to learn his duties as a Director."

Quotation from Mr. Brownsmiller:

"I am from the County of Schuylkill. We have applications printed and send them to the Justices of the Peace and Aldermen. If a person wants outdoor relief he has to go before a Justice and fill out and answer some twenty-five or thirty questions—as to the number of children, their ages, and the cause of destitution, etc. In addition to that he has to have on that application the names of two property owners, to swear that the facts stated are true. Then we make inquiry as to the destitution and condition of the family, and in many cases we find that the Justice is delinquent in his duty and swears the man and then goes to these people and they put on their names. So we want to make these people responsible who swear these parties to these papers. We were allowed $20,000 last year and paid out some $21,000. Twelve years ago the outdoor relief of our county was $42,000. It was this way: The Directors expected from fifteen to twenty-five per cent from every storekeeper.

Desertion is a great question with us. The minimum we allow is fifty cents a week, and from that to $2.50. We pay no rent and no coal bills, and we have it printed on the order that the storekeeper must give nothing but provisions. Some will take nothing the first, second, or third week, and the fourth week will buy a blanket, and the storekeeper puts it down "Provisions." Graft is at the bottom of it. It is graft."

Discussion on the paper is called for.

Mr. D. E. Mackin (Luzerne): There is such a variation in the different portions of the State, in the amounts given and in the manner in which it is handled, that this is a question that should be discussed. I think our county gave $32,000 last year for outdoor relief, and I don't think any part of it went wrong. Our theory is to try and hold the family together. We think we should preserve the home ties as long as possible.

Mr. Smith (Erie): We are not able to get along without spending considerable money for out-door relief. We have a county of 118,000 and of course there are many widows with children. We try to keep families together, but the best we can do it costs quite a number of thousand dollars for that class of relief. If we didn't help those families I think we would hear from our Judge right away. It costs us about $50,000 for the poor and insane, and a good many thousand dollars for outdoor relief.

Mr. Childs (Luzerne): We have a population of 206,000. We have spent $32,000 for outdoor relief, and if that isn't enough we will spend $40,000 or $50,000. The idea with us is not how little we can spend, but how judiciously a large amount can be spent. I think we should see that they are properly taken care of, if it does cost a few thousand.

Mr. William Bennett (Allegany): I take a kind of a Christian view of this subject and this work. I have my thoughts on paper, and I will read it.

ADDRESS OF MR. BENNETT.

Mr. President, Ladies, and Members of this Association:

This is my second year as a member of the Directors of the Poor and my second convention to attend with you. I can say that I like the work very much and feel that it is a work that every Director should use his best endeavor to perform, for, according to the Word of God, I believe that we are not only responsible to those who put us in office but are equally responsible to God and will have to give an account of our stewardship to Him of how we dealt with the worthy poor. As I will endeavor to show in my few remarks farther on, I wish to state that I have two splendid men for my partners in this work. They are both very agreeable and, like myself, they both give their whole time to the work, and I can say that not one worthy one in the county has been turned away without giving aid that has made request, for the three of us feel that what is one's interest is the interest of all. So with this feeling we move on togethr in this work of caring for the poor.

We have two splendid institutions in Allegheny County—a hospital for the insane and a home for the poor. At the Hospital we have for our Superintendent, J. Lewis Srodes, M. D., and at the Home, Samuel W. Lea, who is Superintendent of that department. These are both God-fearing men, and they try to make it just as pleasant as it is possible for the inmates of whom they have charge. So you see that with such men in charge, our institutions are bound to be a success. Then, again, I can say that we do not have the trouble in Allegheny County that some of my brother Directors have in different parts of the State, where the Controller of their county advances a certain amount and they cannot go above the amount advanced, but in Allegheny County we have a free hand to use the poor tax to the best advantage for the welfare of the inmates of these two institutions, the poor and the needy in outdoor relief. While we are doing this, we feel that we are doing something that will please the Almighty.

If all the taxes that are assessed in Allegheny County were paid in, we would have almost two hundred thousand dollars to distribute among the inmates of these two institutions and for outdoor relief for the worthy poor in the district outside of the city of Pittsburg, and if I, as one of the three men who are delegated to see that this money is used for this purpose, close my hand and stint the worthy poor who are in need of the necessaries of life, for which this money was paid, what would the taxpayers think of me? I leave you to judge. And then again, what would the Almighty think, who has commanded us to open wide our hand toward the poor and needy of the land, which we have endeavored to do and will do as long as we have anything to do with this work, I do not believe we should skimp the worthy poor.

I want to quote a little Scripture to you on this. In Deuteronomy, fifteenth chapter and eleventh verse, you will see the following:

"For the poor shall never cease out of the land, therefore I command thee saying, thou shalt open thine hand wide unto thy brother to thy poor and to thy needy in thy land."

And in Isaiah, fifty-eighth chapter and seventh verse, you will find these words: "Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry and that thou bring the poor that is cast out to thy house when thou seest the naked that thou cover him and that thou hide not thyself from thine own flesh."

First Samuel, second chapter and eighth verse: "He raiseth up the poor out of the dust and lifteth up the beggar from the dunghill to set them among princes and to make them inherit the throne of glory, for the pillars of the earth are the Lord's and he has set the world upon them."

Isaiah, forty-first chapter, seventh verse: "When the poor and needy seek water and there is none and their tongue faileth for thirst I, the Lord, will hear them; I, the God of Israel, will not forsake."

My brother Directors and Sisters in this work, you can see by this Scripture how the Lord calls our attention in the matter of taking care of the poor and needy of the land.

Now we will come down to our Savior's time and see what He thinks of those who have a kind regard for His poor.

Matthew, twenty-fifth chapter, thirty-first to forty-sixth verses: "When the Son of Man shall come in his glory and all his holy angels with Him, then shall He sit upon the throne of His Glory. And before him shall be gathered all nations and He shall separate them one from another as a shephard divideth his sheep from the goats, and he shall set the sheep on his right hand and the goats on his left. Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the Kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world; for I was hungry and ye gave me meat, I was thirsty and ye gave me drink, I was a stranger and ye took me in, I was naked and ye clothed me, I was sick and ye visited me, I was in prison and ye came unto me. Then shall they on his right hand answer and say, Lord, when saw we thee hungry and gave thee meat, when saw we thee thirsty and gave thee drink or a stranger and took thee in, when saw we thee naked and clothed thee, when saw we thee sick and in prison and came unto thee? Then the Lord answered and said, Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye did it unto me."

So far the Lord shows us in this lesson what regard he has for those who are poor and in want and what pleasure He takes in those who open wide their hand to the wants of the worthy poor and needy of the land.

Now, there is another side to this lesson, and I am sure there is not one in this building who wants to be among the number that composes that other side. Listen!

"Then shall He say also unto them on the left hand, depart from me, ye cursed, into evelasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels, for I was hungry and ye gave me no meat; I was thirsty and ye gave me no drink; I was a stranger and ye took me not in; I was naked and ye clothed me not; I was sick and in prison and ye visited me not, and then shall they sit on His left hand and say, Lord, when saw we thee hungry or thirsty or a stranger or naked or sick and in prison and did not minister unto thee, and then the Lord answered and said, In as much as ye did it not to one of the least of these, my brethren, ye did it not to me, and these shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal."

So, my brother Directors, you can see what great regard the Almighty has for the poor of the land, and what a wonderful blessing is theirs who favor those who are poor and in need; how the act touches the heart of our Lord and causes Him to say, "In as much as you did it to one of the least of these, my brethren, you did it unto me." So you see that every act of kindness done by us to the unfortunate will not be overlooked by our Master, but that we will get great credit for it.

And if we do them an injustice we will surely have it marked against us by our Lord. So let us be careful and mindful and do our duty, so that when these blessings are handed around we may share in them.

In St. Luke, sixteenth chapter nineteenth to thirty-first verses, is another very good lesson of how a poor man named Lazarus fared when he died, of which no doubt you have all read. If not, when you get a chance look it over.. May we all be guided by the Golden Rule—that is, "Do unto others as you would have others do unto you."

Dr. Carl Kelsey (Philadelphia): I didn't suppose this was a Sunday School class, or I would have brought my Bible, and could have read many selections that have as much to do with this question of outdoor relief as those we have heard. Now I have no criticism of the man who seeks inspiration for social service, but the question before us is,

"What is adequate relief?" It is a difficult problem, and I would suggest, as an outsider, that in the discussion so far you have ignored the tremendous differences in industry in the different parts of the State. The counties that as a rule give large amounts for outdoor relief are industrial counties, and the counties that give little relief are agricultural counties. Now how much of the outdoor relief of the industrial counties may be the result of underfed and overworked men becoming pensioners on State funds? How many of us are preaching help to the one who is in a hole and nevertheless kicking him into a hole at the same time? Adequate relief does not consist in overfeeding a sick baby or a sick man. It is as cruel to overdo kindness as to neglect kindness.

There are some who feel that we should never give outdoor relief, because so frequently the results are bad. I think this is in part true because of our lack of knowledge of the conditions. How many of you who are Directors to-day know of the families that were helped, and why they were helped, ten years ago? How many of you are obtaining dta, at present, so that those who come after you will have the proper knowledge as to those you are helping? How many of you are making definite plans for them, so that at the end of a period of time they may be independently established? How many of us are simply sticking our hands into our pockets whenever an appeal comes? Now that is the lazy man's way of doing things. I don't mean to say that we always know what to do, but we ought to be making a serious study of what to do.

So long as a family is really a unit you have no right to break up that family; but wherever that is really destroyed you ought to have common sense enough to recognize the fact, and put the individuals where they can be properly taken care of. I wish the time might come when every decent mother could be with her children until they are of proper age, with a definite understanding of how much she could have for the support of the family, and make her responsible for the care of the children. We should work towards definitely pensioning the family. Go to work and bring some system into outdoor relief work, and place it on a more scientific basis. If you haven't seen the little book published by the State Board of Charities of Indiana, entitled "A Decade of Outdoor Relief in Indiana," I wish you would write to the Secretary of the Board at Indianapolis and have him send you that pamphlet. It contains much valuable information.

Mr. Childs: The conditions must be considered. When a widow with four or five children, three or four of them of school age, expends $15 or $16 a month some might consider it a lavish amount. I say we should give a sufficient amount to enable that woman to take care of those children so they may grow up and be able to care for themselves. In our county each family is given a page in the ledger and a record is kept of each case.

Col. E. P. Gould (Erie): Dr. Kelsey has struck the keynote. I hope every seat in this house will be filled to-night, because Dr. Kelsey is going to talk, and it will be worth coming to hear.

George H. Butler, of Luzerne, here read the following paper:

PAPER BY MR. BUTLER.

"The Recreant Husband and Father; How to Deal with Him."

Among all the defective home conditions, that of the recreant husband and father is perhaps the most difficult for courts and institutions devoted to charitable purposes to cope with, and is the most troublesome for these authorities to handle and correct. I speak of the recreant husband and father, and treat him as one of that class of cases who by nature is not inclined and never was disposed to deal properly with his wife and the children by him begotten.

Born and reared among people of his own kind, his education and training utterly neglected, deprived of an opportunity to acquire a trade, these and many other like causes contribute to render him fundamentally defective.

My theme does not seem to contemplate the sociological phase of the question, that is such problems as how to prevent intermarriages, the procreation of his kind, and the like, but the topic of discussion is rather what to do and how to deal with this class of persons and this deplorable condition as we find it.

These persons who belong to this delinquent class have been the object of much legislation since the foundation of our Government. In the earlier days the laws which are now upon our statute books were more nearly adequate to deal with the problem, and restrain, or punish the offender than the same laws seem to be able to accomplish at the present time owing to changed conditions. This is largely due to increased population and its concentration in great cities, to the invention of labor saving machinery and consequent diminution of employment in the mechanical trades, the demoralizing influences of the factories, the growth of the army of the unemployed, the "bachelor wages" awarded to married men in the great industrial establishments, the high cost of living, and what not.

In every direction, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, in every State and Territory we find the same condition prevails. It may differ in degree only in certain localities. The large cities, the vast centers of population are undoubtedly confronted with the problem to a larger extent than the rural districts.

Several of the States of the Union, notably the State of Illinois, the District of Columbia, and perhaps other States and Territories have enacted laws of a highly stringent and penal character to deal with recreant husbands who desert their families or fail to support them.

The Commissioners on Uniform State Laws in National Conference, late in 1910, prepared and recommended for adoption the "American Uniform Desertion Act," which is not only the most concise but at the same time the most comprehensive plan for dealing with this evil that has in our opinion ever yet been proposed. The offense of desertion and neglect to support the dependants by the responsible head of the family is precisely the same the wide world over, and every argument leads us in the lines of uniformity; in other words, the offenders should be dealt with alike in every State and every Court in the Union.

We recognize that in some states, such as Pennsylvania, that the Constitution as it now stands forbids the formation of a separate Court competent to carry the provisions of such a law into effect. In order to utlimately bring about this desirable and well-night imperative legislation, I am convinced that it is one of the highest aims and one of the most sacred duties of an organization such as this, composed of the representatives of the Poor and Charitable bodies of this imperial Commonwealth, to exercise every effort in our several localities to effect an amendment to our Constitution and the passage of this law thereunder. The adoption of an amendment to the Constitution and the passage of a law by the State of Pennsylvania similar to the American Uniform Desertion Act, should be the greatest aim of this body. Meantime, and until such wholesome legislation shall have been spread upon our statute books, it has occurred to me that our Courts as now constituted might do much, under existing laws, in the direction of accomplishing better results with recreant husbands. In a county such as my own, where we have four Common Pleas Judges, each in turn presiding at Desertion Court, and none of them making a specialty of this class of cases, I say, that by delegating all such cases involving domestic relations to the hands of one of the Judges, who would thereby become more familiar with the scope of the question, learn to distinguish the old and hardened offender from the new, and by frequent and personal contact with the subject, would become more and more of a specialist in the administration of this branch of the law and thus render the greatest service to the community attainable under our present system of laws, antiquated and inadequate though they may be. From last Sunday's issue of the Philadelphia "Press" I clip the following which seems to substantiate the argument for the necessity of a separate court to handle and dispose of the cases under discussion:

"The Domestic Relations Court in Chicago, which was established only six months ago, appears to have been doing a rushing business. It has disposed of 2,484 cases, or more than sixteen for each working day. Out of these, only eighty-three persons were sent to the House of Correction, while more than $25,000 has been collected by the Court for the benefit of deserted wives and children, and 1,250 estranged husbands and wives have been reconciled to each other. This is a pretty good record, but every court, whether specially constituted to deal with these cases or not, makes a good record when it takes them up in a human and understanding way. A very large proportion of the domestic troubles that get into the courts are trivial, and can be adjusted by a little common sense advice. A great deal depends upon the Judge who sits in such cases; he needs to have particular talent for the job, and we assume from the statistics that the Chicago Judge is pretty lucky in this respect."

Mr. Walter Bowditch, of Germantown, read the following paper on "Almshouse Management:"

PAPER BY MR. BOWDITCH.

I have been asked to address you on several topics relating to Almshouse Management—House Farming, Dietary, Discipline, etc. To do so at length would consume more time than we have at our disposal. However, I will endeavor briefly to touch upon the subjects in question.

The managements of almshouses necessarily differ in cities and in the counties. The main essentials in each, however, I think the same—a good superintendent and matron. With these secured, and that is no easy task, more than one-half the difficulties are overcome. They must have experience, patience, and a thorough understanding of human nature. Without the latter their virtues are indeed as nought.

A serious proposition is to secure sufficient, and efficient help; necessarily a difficult thing, where so many unfortunates are crippled, or deprived of their sight. The inmates naturally do not come from a very exalted strata of society; and to properly teach them, so that they may be depended upon; to keep the house in a cheerful state; and the place in a sanitary condition, require constant care and vigilance and a wonderful stock of patience. But firmness and kindness will do all things, and these among the rest.

Upon the selection of our own Superintendent and Matron we are indeed to be congratulated. Brother Rausenberg is a man of long experience in overseeing work of this kind; possesses the confidence of everyone in our community, and the respect and regard of all the inmates. His daughter, with her untiring energy and kindly sympathy, is indeed a worthy helper in this cause.

In regard to the farm, I consider them an invaluable adjunct to any county almshouse. With good management it will provide the inmates with all the fresh vegetables in season, and leave a large surplus for the winter. Fruits of different kinds may also be grown; and these, carefully preserved, will proved a palatable and healthful addition to the menu, at a time of the year most needed. If the farm be a large one, so much the better. A regular farmer can then be secured to give his entire attention to this branch; and the results I am confident will be astonishing. On our grounds in Germantown we grow sufficient vegetables of all kinds, with one exception—potatoes.

The cultivation of the farm, from an economical point of view alone, is most valuable. But to me it is vastly more. Temporarily at least, it keeps the minds of those so employed from brooding over their unfortunate circumstances; makes them a little more independent, if I may use that word. In fact causes them to feel that they are not altogether subjects of charity; that they are giving something in return for the care and attention bestowed upon them. And that although they are wrecks upon life's pathway, they have been placed here for some purpose, and in the sight of man and their Maker they are of some use after all.

And now as to Dietary. The meals should be served at regular hours; and consist of good plain food. This may be varied with a change of meats and vegetables each day, so that something different may be always looked for. Variety here is indeed the spice of life. This will cost no more in the long run, and with fresh milk and butter from the farm, and the cooking properly done (this indeed a most important point), the inmates will be provided with appetizing and substantial food.

A final word or two as to discipline. Those forced to seek the charity of the taxpayers, should not of course be made to feel that they are paupers. But if so unforunate should be welcomed, and treated with kindness and consideration. The females may do the light work, sweeping and weeding; the able bodied men can look after the farm work. The rules of the institution must be rigidly enforced. Frequent bathing, proper changes of clothing, and a neat and cleanly appearance, are at all times to be insisted upon. Infractions of the rules may be punished by forbidding the use of tobacco to the offenders for a time; or by depriving them of some of the little luxuries to which they would otherwise be entitled; while a few days solitary confinement will generally bring even the vicious to a proper appreciation of the behavior expected of them. These matters should be left entirely to the Superintendent, and his experience and good judgment will readily suggest the proper remedies to obtain the best results. His decision should be considered final, and his authority upheld by the board at all times.

In conclusion let me say, that in all matters concerning the management of these institutions, just as in all lines of business, if success is to be attained, the main essential is the application of that much under rated but stirling virtue, good common horse sense. Just such good sense, as we might expect from that noble character Charles Dickens. This great man who with his mighty and inspired pen, overthrew long established and strongly entrenched wrongs; pilloried official stupidity, brutality, and ignorance; and who more than any other man of his generation helped to pave the way for the dawn of a bright and happier day for the unfortunate, old and young, who, through their own or others' misfortunes, become the charges of their fellow men.

Mr. Colborn: I think we should use this time in discussion of the paper on wife desertion. This convention passed a resolution asking the Legislature to enact a law making wife desertion a felony. A legislative committee was appointed and they went to Harrisburg and a bill was prepared, but failed in its passage. Since then I have heard a great deal of talk advocating this bill and I think by the meeting of another Legislature that bill will became a law.

I think it would be wise for this convention to appoint another committee to see that the bill is properly drawn and presented at the next Legislature, and I would suggest that Brother Butler become the Chairman of that committee. It is a reform that is needed, and it is his bill. And coupled with that we ought to have a more strenuous divorce law. Twenty-five years ago there was but one divorce for every seventy marriages; ten years ago one for every ten marriages; three years ago, in Kansas City and in Chicago there was one divorce for every four marriages. This is appalling indeed. In the months of June and July, in the city of New York, there were forty wife desertions reported each day. In our own State the number was no less, in proportion. In the rural districts our courts have ten or fifteen cases each term, and something ought to be done to bring about a different state of affairs.

Mr. Charles S. Loesel, of Erie, here read the following paper on "Almshouse Hints:"

PAPER BY MR. LOESEL.

Mr. President, Ladies, and Gentlemen:

It gives me great pleasure to attend the Thirty-seventh Annual Convention of the Association of Directors of the Poor, and I felt honored when asked to address you on the subject of "Almshouse Hints."

The heart of an almshouse is a good steward and matron, and in order to do the most good there must also be intelligent help and proper discipline. A great mistake is made in appointing a new steward and matron every time there is a change on the Board of Directors for political reasons. In order to be a good steward a man must have experience as a mechanic, he must also be a good buyer, be kind and temperate. He should have absolute control over the employees of the institution, governing them by example and suggestion rather than by direct orders. When an employee has a grievance I do not think it right for the Directors to give him any advice or make any promises before taking the matter up with the Steward to find out what the trouble is. I never did approve of employing a man or woman in the institution for political reasons, or of giving them a position if they are not capable of properly fulfilling it. As soon as an institution adopts these suggestions —possibly with some alterations—it will be greatly improved, and the results will be in harmony with the ideas of the taxpayers; the efficiency of the almshouse will be increased with a reduction of the expenditures.

We have just installed a new heating system in our institution which has taken the place of one that was installed thirty years ago. The heating of a public institution is a very essential matter, because we have so many people of different ages who want their rooms at different temperatures. We have adopted a regulating valve that controls a radiator and locks itself, which enables us to adjust the temperature regulator at any degree between fifty and seventy, and after adjusting keeps the room at the desired temperature automatically. Another important feature is the ventilating of a county home in which there is a lingering odor that cannot be overcome, especially noticeable in homes that were built years ago. Fortunately we have a great many chimneys with three flues in each in our building, of which we have taken advantage by placing registers in each flue a foot above the floor which draw the cold air from the floors and the foul air from the room. These registers also prove a great saving of fuel.

I have always thought that a most excellent plan for county homes would be to have the different churches of the cities give entertainments during the winter months for the inmates of the almshouses. I know that there are a great many people who are housed in the different institutions thoughout the State who have been good citizens and taxpayers and through hardship and misfortune have been carried there, and I know that music and singing relieves the mind of grief and care. The most pitiful condition that I know of is where a husband and wife in their 60's or 70's are taken into a county home, after having lived a married life, either happily or miserably, and in their last days have to be separated from each other. I believe there ought to be provisions made to care for them together, providing they are able to give themselves the proper attention.

I never could understand why an inmate of a county institution, if he or his friends have not the amount of money necessary to bury him in a potters' field, his body must be sent to some medical college. When a tramp is killed on the railroad, or through any accident, in any county of this State, and he never in his life has paid one cent of tax, or performed any of his duties as a citizen, and the body is not identified by friends, his body must be taken and given a burial in the potters' field.

There are a great many other hints that would apply to almshouses, but at present I think these are sufficient, and if followed out would be a source of great satisfaction to everyone.

ADDRESS OF MR. YOST.

Mr. H. F. Yost, of Somerset, addressed the convention as follows on "Relation of the Almshouse to Hospital Under the County Care of the Insane":

I heard an excellent discussion this morning on legislation pertaining to the care of the insane and the poor; that the poor were looked after first. That is, that the laws all related to the care of the poor and the insane were neglected, until about 1850, when laws were passed placing them in the State hospitals, but in 1897 it was found that the State hospitals were unable to care for them. I think the same conditions prevail to-day. They say at Dixmont there are three hundred sleeping in halls. That argument was used when an appropriation was asked for. Under the Act of 1897 the counties are allowed to care for their insane. Our county erected a hospital in which sixty-five can be taken care of. Under the rule laid down we are compelled to take care of nearly a hundred. Now we are building an addition to the hospital so we can care for a hundred and ten.

To-day we have a hundred patients in the insane hospital. We have about fifty paupers.

Now, the question is, "The Relation of the Almshouse to the Hospital." I am not a physician and can say nothing in relation to the association of paupers with the insane. They must necessarily associate some in the counties where they take care of both classes.

In the fifty cases of paupers that we have, a large number are mentally deficient to a certain extent. I believe if the Directors of the Poor and those interested will go over the lists in their homes they will find many paupers who are mentally deficient, but not to a degree that they have to be committed to the hospital. I would say I believe there isn't a great deal of difference; that they border on one another—the pauper class and the insane.

There is another side to this question. Somerset and Blair and Allegehy counties have had insane hospitals for year; Fayette and Westmoreland and Cambria are considering the advisability of erecting them. I think it would be a great saving to have the buildings on the same farm, especially in the smaller counties. Of course, it is out of the question to have them in the same building. One Superintendent, in a small county, would be sufficient if you have one farm. Our buildings are probably worth $50,000, and it takes about $35,000 to take care of these people.

There should be a medical Superintendent to care for the insane hospital, and the attendants should be the best to be had. In purchasing supplies a great deal could be saved by purchasing for both institutions at the same time.

As to labor on the farm, we get a great deal more labor from the insane than from the paupers. The paupers in our county are able to do but very little. Some are taken by farmers and given homes. I am satisfied they are better off there. The insane are able to do considerable work, and they are far better off for being out on the farm at work. We have nine attendants for our hundred insane, and that is not too many.

The question of the relation of the almshouse to the hospital could be more ably discussed, from a theoretical point of view, by a physician, but I am trying to give you the practical side. If you are a small county you better not try to erect a hospital; the expense will be too great. I would be glad to hear from some physician on this subject.

Mr. Colborn: I have been appealed to by various Boards of Directors, from time to time, setting forth that the Auditors of their district had surcharged them a certain amount for attending this Association.

Nearly all the Poor Boards of the State, since 1877, are acting under special law, and it gives the right to the Directors of the Poor to frame ordiances, rules, and regulations for the governing of their homes, to be approved by the Court of Quarter Sessions, providing they are not repugnant to the laws of the State. In our county we had rules and regulations approved, giving the Directors the right to attend these conventions at the expense of the county. The Court, in his opinion approving them, said he thought the county would be benefited a great deal more than the amount of the expense. In 1898 the Board of Cumberland County attended the convention at Philadelphia, and the following winter the Auditors surcharged them for that attendance; not their own expenses, but the expenses of their attorney and clerk and steward, amounting to some $80. An appeal was taken from the Auditors' surcharge, and it went to the Superior Court, and the opinion was delivered by Judge Orlady July 29, 1898, in which he relieves the Directors from that surcharge.

It is reported in 7 Pennsylvania Reports at page 616.

Mr. Colborn here read the opinion of Judge Orlady.

President Ochse: I see I am on the program for a word on "Echoes from the National Conference of Charities at Boston." I have but a few words to say. As your representative, I attended the thirty-eighth conference at Boston, June 7th to 14th. In many respects it was a remarkable convention. I was surprised at the attendance. The first session was held in Tremont Temple, and the Governor of Massachusetts welcomed the deiegates and made an address. In behalf of the city of Boston, the acting Mayor welcomed the delegates. Addresses were made by such prominent men as Dr. Charles Elliott, and papers were read by men of National reputation.

On the platform were many people of note in this line of work, among them Robert W. DeForest and Charles Edward Hart and Alexander Johnson, Miss Jane Adams, and many others.

The building was fully occupied, standing room was at a premium, and the audiences were enthusiastic. Men and women of every profession were there and people of note from every State in the Union.

After the general session Thursday morning at 9 o'clock at Ford Hall, about 11 o'clock the session divided itself into five sectional meetings. Eight halls were occupied, so you could go to whatever hall the subject you wished to hear about was being discussed. It was impossible for one to attend all the meetings. Five or six were going on at one time. I was selected to represent the State of Pennsylvania on the place of next meeting, and after a good deal of discussion we decided on Cleveland, Ohio, for the next meeting, and I would suggest that as many as possible go to this meeting. I regret that we haven't some of the papers to read here. I tried to induce Miss Jane Adams to come to our convention, but she said it was impossible.

The convention was remarkable for the great number of prominent people present and for the businesslike manner in which it was conducted. The Secretary was a very busy man. He had some one ready to take the chair at all the meetings, and every one was ready with their papers or to enter into the discussions. It seemed to me remarkable that they could keep meetings going in five different halls and the committee meetings at the same time.

I see a party here whom I met in Boston at that conference. I refer to Mrs. Edward Lindsey.

Mrs. Lindsey was applauded as she came forward, and she said:

This is an unexpected honor. I can add my testimony to what Mr. Ochse has said—that the conference at Boston was an exceedingly interesting and inspiring one, and I enjoyed it thoroughly up to the last moment. And this is the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, which is not always true of what I say at these conventions. One of the papers was largely given over to the question of the degeneracy of New England. I was deeply interested, and what brought the point especially home was that a very progressive female arose and traced the line of degeneracy, giving the name of the town where the degenerate line started, at about Northampton, and it culminated in the most awful degeneracy known in this country in the town in which I was born. (Applause and laughter.)

Prof. Clark, of the Normal School at Indiana, arose and said: "I am commissioned by the Board of Trustees and the faculty and student body at large to extend an invitation to all of the members of this convention, and their wives and sweethearts, if they have any, to come to the Normal at 6 o'clock to-night and dine with us. You are welcome at any time between this time and 6 o'clock to inspect our plant. We would like to have you inspect it from the garret to the kitchen and laundry. It is to-day as it is every day." (Applause).

Upon motion, the convention adjourned until 7:45 this evening.

Following the adjournment the delegates were conveyed in carriages and automobiles to the State Normal School, and, upon arriving at this admirable institution, were divided into small parties, each of which was conducted throughout the buildings by a teacher or attendant of the school and were shown the utmost hospitality and kindness. The character of the buildings, the remarkable cleanliness and order of all departments, and the bearing of the teachers and all concerned was a subject of most favorable comment on the part of all the delegates.

After being shown over the entire buildings they were invited into the large dining rooms and served with a very enjoyable dinner.

It is not too much to say that in the Normal School at Indiana the State has an institution of which it should be proud, and more than one of the delegates expressed the wish that their children could be in such a school.

EVENING SESSION.

The convention was called to order by President Ochse at 7:45 o'clock and was delightfully entertained by the Conservatore Orchestra of the Normal School, conducted by Prof. Cogswell. Encores were demanded and responded to.

Prayer was offered by the Rev. J. W. Carey.

Following the prayer the Glee Club of the State Normal School rendered several selections, which were thoroughly enjoyed.

The President of the Board of Public Charities, the Hon. Francis J. Torrence, of Pittsburg, then read an interesting paper on "Pennsylvania, Her Insane and Criminals." It was received with applause. The paper follows:

PAPER BY MR. TORRENCE.

As precious stones become jewels by contact with each other, or by contact with the wheel of the lapidary, so may men, congregated as we are here met to-day, become brighter and of greater value and usefulness by contact, even to the point of abrasion, among each other.

The body gathered here to-day represents a great cause and I am hoping that among the assembly to-day the Boards of County Commissioners or prison inspectors and wardens may be sufficiently represented to take that lively interest in this work, the benefit of which will be reflected in their several institutions.

Hon. FRANCIS J. TORRENCE

President of the Board of Public Charities,
Who Delivered a Very Able Address, and Is Greatly Interested in the Work of the Association.

I have never yet, in my official capacity, found fault for the sake of finding fault, but ever with the desire to better the condition coming within my purview. I am constrained, however, to find fault with some of the jails' management and with many of the jails within this Commonwealth. Do not construe me as meaning to hold them up to public scorn or to air our unclean linen in the public highway. Rather it is my desire, by criticism, to better a condition that is by no means creditable. Pennsylvania has the grandest showing of all the States in the Union in the record of her public charities, and, to my mind, the only blot on our otherwise bright escutcheon is the condition of some of our jails.

I am not going to speak so much on the theme assigned me, "The Insane and Criminals," but rather of their care and management. It is a basic principle in all charities and corrections that the individual entrusted to our care, either as an indigent, a defective or a criminal, should be returned to society as good at least as when received, so far as lies within our power. This should be true morally and physically, but I want to say to you that the condition of some of our jails absolutely prohibits this.

Further than that, and I am now going to make a strong statement: The construction and arrangement of certain of our jails absolutely requires the jailor to conduct his jail in defiance of existing laws.

The act of June 12, 1893, page 459 reads as follows:

"No child under restraint or conviction, under sixteen years of age, shall be placed in any apartment or cell of any prison or place of confinement, or in any court room during the trial of adults, or in any vehicle of transportation in company with adults charged with or convicted of crime.

"It shall be the duty of the Board of County Commissioners, in each county of the Commonwealth, to provide in the county separate room, or rooms or a suitable building, to be used exclusively for the confinement of any and all children under the age of sixteen years, who may be in custody waiting trial or hearing in the courts of the county."

I have very recently inspected jails that have no provision whatever for carrying into effect the above law. We all know the unfairness of housing minor offenders with criminals. Instead of making prisons the reformatory institutions that they should and are intended to be, we make them a sort of preparator school for law breakers. The youthful mind, in its naturally receptive condition, coming in contact with the mind of the hardened criminal, is easily influenced for the future and upon his release, the youth comes out, in nine cases out of ten, worse than when he went in. I am, by no means, a believer in total depravity. I believe, on the other hand, that environment has as much, if not more, to do in forming character than any other element and to those of us who are in charge of the mighty works we are convened here to-day to discuss, must accept the responsibility for a large percentage of the future of those entrusted to our care or custody and that the formative period is, after all, the important one in life. We shall, of course, not look for a Eutopia or Eutopian condition but be, in all things, reasonable, conscientious and ever alert and I consider, as intimated above, that jails and jail management are themes that we cannot devote too much eanest consideration to.

Proper buildings, in true conformity with the spirit and letter of the law should be provided and thereby the responsibility of fulfilling the requirements of the law as to the segregation of the juvenile.

Now while still on this question of jail construction, I do not recall any statute requiring separate building for the segregation of the women prisoners while confined in jails but the great law of common decency and human intelligence dictates to us that the placing of women prisoners in cells adjoining those occupied by men criminals should govern us in administration and, of course, admonish us that it is wrong in the fullest sense of the word to house the two sexes in the same building, evening though in separate cells.

The evils of such conditions is so apparent that argument or comment is unnecessary.

Do not understand me as indicating in this address that we, in this Commonwealth, are alone in this inferior jail condition. It obtains, to the best of my knowledge, generally in all the other States and particularly in what we have come to call, by common consent, the "country counties," i. e. those counties removed from the larger centers of population and where the jails or country prisons are smaller. An entirely new plan for the governing of jails surely is essential.

I have repeatedly stated in official communications that the management of jails by Sheriffs is faulty in the extreme. There are few men who hold the office of Sheriff who have any qualification for the important duties of prison management.

I know I will be met, either openly or secretly with the argument that it costs more to manage jails by a Prison Board and the employment of a Warden, devoting his entire time to prison management, but if we are simply going to put this subject solely on a financial basis, let us then return to the Mediaeval stage and simply confine the prisoner without any regard to his future condition, physical or moral. We have two duties to perform in the care of the prisoner or criminal. One is to society, in that we confine or restrain the offender and prevent his further evil acts so long as the period of incarceration lasts. The other duty is to the prisoner himself, from both a moral and economic standpoint, with a view to returning him to society better than when we got him, or at least as good and with the hope that he will not again be a charge upon society.

I repeat again that the physical question of jail construction, coupled with the equally important question of jail management has all to do with both these questions and as it is our duty as good citizens to provide such means and engage such methods as will tend to a bettering.

It is with much regret that the bill which would have remedied this condition and which I prepared, with the approval of the Board of Charities, failed of passage in the last two sessions of the Legislature. I will hope for better things from future Legislatures and shall, with the aid and approval of my colleagues, keep at it as we have in the past on other and equally important acts.

Now don't put a wrong construction on my condemnation and take it that all of the sixty-seven (67) jails or county prisons in the State are bad. Thank goodness, this condition does not obtain in all of them. On the other hand, we have many excellent county prisons in this Commonwealth, excellent in both construction and management. My object is to have all the poor ones raised to a par or plane of the best and let Pennsylvania be referred to by sister Commonwealths as a pattern or example for jails and jail managements as she is in many other public capacities and institutions.

As to the insane, the second subject allotted to me in my address, this question will be dealt with, I notice, by my friend and colleague, Dr. Frank Woodbury, and it would be unfair to rob him, both of the time and the meat of the subject. Permit me, however, to say that there has been a vast improvement in the past decade in the care and treatment of our indigent insane, which class is more directly of interest to this organization.

It took quite a long time to reach a successful termination of legislation so much sought by us and which culminated finally in the passage of what is commonly known as "The County Care Act" first adopted May 25, 1897. The benefits of this act, both to the patient and the county and to society generally, for that matter, I believe is now an accepted fact (let me hope that our efforts to improve jail conditions will meet finally with the same results, for it was a strenuous contention to reach what we now have). The act has been amended since to the mutual benefit of the county and the insane. The entire effort of the bill has for its object the improvement of the indigent insane and their environment.

Since the passage of this act (now fourteen years in effect) many counties have shown their appreciation of it and have built substantial and satisfactory county hospitals for the indigent insane, removed them from unfit surroundings under the old almshouse condition and placed them comfortably in buildings adapted to their housing and accorded them care and treatment as the bill provides and on a par with that afforded in the State hospitals for these unfortunte wards of ours.

Let me say here briefly and on behalf of the Board of Charities and its Committee on Lunacy, that we are highly gratified at the cordial reception and support that this act has received at your hands and it is our great hope that the good work will go on and that other counties will follow those who have already accepted and benefitted under it.

Those of you who have been in the work for fifteen or twenty years and who will, for a moment, contrast the conditions existing to-day with those prevailing at the earlier date, cannot but feel gratified and rejoiced in the improvement of your charges, for under the most favorable conditions, their misfortune is indeed great. Yours is no easy task, and I now address myself to those of you who are particular entrusted with the care of the insane. It is a work that cannot be paid for in money, but the satisfaction that we have in knowing that a good deed or a good task for a suffering fellow being has been accomplished to our best ability, is, after all, full recompense, and herein lies the virtue.

While studying over the work of this conference and the daily work of its members, my mind recalls the quotation discovered on an ancient gate-way in a city long since destroyed. The inscription was as follows:

"Man may not take with him aught of his possessions beyond the grave. Let him increase the greatness of his good deeds; even the white ants do increase the height of their habitations. For neither father nor mother, neither sister nor brother, neither son nor wife may accompany him to the other world, but virtue only may be his comrade."

Lafcadio Hearn recites this quotation after describing the utter destruction of what had been beautiful palaces, temples, and monuments and showing their utter ruin. He comes upon the above words, graven upon a stone gateway which has survived the wreck of a thousand years and I thought it particularly apropos on this occasion.

Early in my address I spoke, in a general way, of the good in the way of charities that our Commonwealth has done. Let me give you some facts and some dates because figures always impress themselves more fixedly upon the human mind than words or phrases. I think you will agree with me when we consider what has been done that we have, in Pennsylvania, cared for our dependent, defective and delinquent classes in a manner of which we may be justifiably proud.

In 1818 an act providing for the Western Penitentiary was passed and shortly afterwards the buildings were begun on land situated on what is now the North Side of the City of Pittsburg. The scheme originally was for solitary confinement, but was later changed to the congregate system. Three years later, or in 1821, the Eastern Penitentiary was authorized by an Act of March 20th and the work of erecting the same begun shortly thereafter. This prison also was intended to be conducted under the solitary system and remains under such system to the present day.

In 1878 an act was passed creating a middle penitentiary district and authorizing the erection of an additional penitentiary. Nothing was done toward the construction of the buildings and three years later, or June, 1881, the act was amended and the State Industrial Reformatory succeeded to the ground and provisions made for the middle penitentiary and under the act and its subsequent amendments, the Pennsylvania Industrial Reformatory, located at Huntingdon, fills the requirements of the subsequent acts for the governing of the class of prisoners committed for reformation.

The Pennsylvania Reform School at Morganza succeeds in title to the House of Refuge, incorporated in 1850 and located in Woods Run, Allegheny, and afterwards removed to Morganza in Washington County. Subsequent acts increasing and changing the powers in the management of this institution were passed and are in effect.

The insane under State care are provided for in five hospitals covering prescribed districts in accordance with the various acts incorporating the same and are located respectively at Harrisburg, Dixmont, Warren, Danville, and Norristown. An additional hospital, under State control and under the Homeopathic School of Medicine as to its management, is under construction at Allentown. A new hospital district which will provide for the insane of certain counties was created by Act of 1901.

In addition to the hospitals for the insane, the State, in its wisdom, provided a special institution for the chronic insane, and under the Act of 1891 the asylum at Wernersville was erected. The act specially qualifies that no person who has been insane for a period of less than one year shall be committed to this institution.

An institution in which the Board of Charities and its Committee on Lunacy have been peculiarly interested is that known as the "Criminal Insane Asylum" provided for under Act of May, 1905. Those of you who are at all interested in the question of the care of the insane know how essential it is to segregate those of the criminal class or with criminal instinct from those of our other unfortunates in this general class.

A most worthy and most successful institution was provided for when, by Act of June 3, 1893, the Western Pennsylvania State Institution for the Feeble-Minded and located at Polk was created, and an equally important one when, by Act of May 15, 1903, the Eastern Pennsylvania State Institution for Feeble-Minded and Epileptics and located at Spring City, in Chester County, followed the enactment.

At Elwyn we have an institution for a similar class, in a measure, to those provided for under the acts and the two institutions just remarked upon. This is a training school for idiotic and feeble-minded children and is located at Elwyn. It is not the State property, but was incorporated under a special act in 1853 and to which the State appropriates at the rate of $180 per capita per annum for the care and treatment of the inmates. It has an estimated population of 750 children at the present time.

Passing from the defective class to the dependent class, we have made equal progress in caring for them. Permit me to call your attention to a few of the institutions.

In 1884 the Pennsylvania Oral School for Deaf Mutes was established and located at Scranton. It has about one hundred inmates as an average population.

Under an act of 1888 the "Western Pennsylvania Institution for the Blind" was incorporated. This institution particularly provides for blind youth resident in the western part of the State, and has been eminently successful, occupying at the present time five commodious buildings in a beautiful part of the city of Pittsburg. It has, among other of its buildings, a commodious gymnasium, affording much beneficial recreation for the inmates.

For the deaf and dumb the State has provided two large institutions, one at Mt. Airy, Philadelphia, incorporated among our earliest charities and now over ninety years old. Fifty years after the incorporation of Mt. Airy Institution, as it is commonly called among us, a similar institution was created and located at Edgewood, in Allegheny County, near Pittsburg. Both of these institutions receive from the Commonwealth's treasury an appropriation covering the per capita for maintenance of an estimated population.

A most interesting institution, and one which must appeal to all who know its good work, is that known as "The Home for the Training of Speech of Deaf Children Before They Are of School Age"—a longer title than some of the little people I saw there who are so ably cared for and so happy, notwithstanding their great affliction. An interesting feature I found in his institution was that each little person able to manage it was provided with his own little garden, and the beneficial results from the outdoor employment are wonderful.

In addition to the institution for the blind at Pittsburg, there is at Overbrook, Pa., under a very early act, a large institution for the instruction of the blind. It receives a stated amount of what are known as "State's patients" and for which the Commonwealth appropriates at a per capita rate of $275 per annum.

Pennsylvania is recognized the world over as vastly rich in mineral wealth, and principal among these minerals our coal is our chief item, and to bring it to the surface and make it of value thousands are employed in its mining and shipping. Owing to the importance of this industry the State has made special provision for those employed in the mines and about the coal works, and under various provisions of several acts hospitals for injured persons have been located at Ashland, at Hazleton, at Scranton, at Shamokin, at Blossburg, at Philipsburg, at Mercer, and at Connellsville were created under a special act caring for miners engaged in mining in the bituminous and semi-bituminous coal fields and are known as "Cottage Field Hospitals."

On the question of hospitals generally there stands on our list and recognized for general and special hospital service one hundred and eighty-three fully equipped institutions, over one hundred and fifty of which receive substantial State aid. I believe no other State contributes as does Pennsylvania in this particular, but the matter is left as a local question in most of the States and the communities are required to support the hospitals or do without them. I think our system is the best—not simply because it is our system, but because, after a careful survey of the entire situation, I believe the sick and injured are better provided for under our methods than if depending upon the community alone. I am, however, constrained to say that the Board of Charities have, from time to time, tried to place and still try to place the State's money on a pro rata or as nearly as possible pro rata basis for bed capacity and free treatment accorded.

You are familiar with the liberal appropriations made by our various Legislatures to the treatment of tuberculosis in the State, and for which purpose institutions under State management and control have been completed and others are being erected. In addition to these State institutions, we have thirteen private sanatoria for the treatment of tubercular patients, doing, I am gratified to say, and you will be equally gratified to learn, a wonderful work among this unfortunate class. The institutions are well located through the various counties of the Commonwealth from Delaware in the east to Allegheny in the west.

Under the heading of homes in all the various classes, from the helpless infant in the cradle to the equally helpless aged of both sexes, ample provision has been made. It would tire you for me to enumerate the names of them, but will equally interest you, and I know gratify you also to learn that there are over three hundred of these homes and orphanages scattered over the sixty-seven counties of the State. Many of them are private institutions, but many of them receive substantial State aid.

In conclusion, let me paraphrase the beautiful hymn, and without the least degree of either levity or sacrilege, but in the fullest sincerity:

Count your many blessings,
Name them one by one,
And it will surprise you
What the State has done.

Following Mr. Torrence's paper the Glee Club sang two numbers, which were greatly enjoyed.

Mr. Edward S. Lindsey, of Warren, Pa., was here introduced by President Ochse and read the following very interesting paper on "The Juvenile Court Law," prefacing it with these words:

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen.

The subject that has been announced is so broad that I wish to hasten to assure you that I shall make no attempt to cover it this evening; indeed I do not know how that could be done. As to the operation of the Juvenile Court laws we have little information except from general observation. We have no detailed statistics of the operation of these acts, or of the work of the courts under them. So that when we turn to what liteature we can find upon the subject we find simply general statements either in the way of ecomium or of criticism; so that to-night I simply wish to direct your attention to one or two items in relation to the operation of these acts. And first I call your attention to the fact that the Juvenile Court laws, and the whole movement, is not an absolutely new thing, but that it is he result of the growh and development and the result of two opposing tendencies, one of which might be called the socialistic tendency, manifested by the various acts of the Legislature; the other the individualistic tendency, manifested by the attitude of the courts towards these acts, very frequently declaring them unconstitutional.

Then I wish to briefly offer some criticisms on two or three phases of the Juvenile Court laws, and, finally, make one or two suggestions as to how the Juvenile Court laws we have could be changed to bring them more in harmony with general legal principles and to fit better into our general legal system, still preserving everything that has been so beneficial.

Mr. Lindsey reads:

PAPER BY MR. EDWARD S. LINDSEY

"The Juvenile Court Law."

The somewhat heterogeneous mass of legislation comprised under the common designation of "Juvenile Court Laws" presents a most interesting phase of modern legislative tendencies. As much a mytsery to the lawyer as the layman, these so-called "laws," while furnishing rules of decision for numerous cases have not as yet found a place in the legal system. Aside from a few destinctions as to the constitutionality of such acts the lawyer will look almost in vain for reported cases arising under them and yet the cases which arise and are disposed of involve frequently fundamental legal principles, for questions of status are the most fundamental of all legal questions. These laws are purely statutory and may best be regarded as law in the becoming rather than in the actual and as yet indeed it may well be doubted how much of these experimental statutory provisions will ever become law in the true sense of the term. For the most part these statutes pay little or no regard to established legal principles. They are the expression of philanthropic theories for social betterment, not of experience or social practice and if they ever take a permanent place in the law must undergo a long process of adaptation to social needs. Yet there is already a considerable literature of the movement mostly propagandist in character. It is of the nature either of paneygric or of criticism and for the most part based not on actual observation and study but on preconceived theories. We need sorely a careful and impartial study of the operation of these statutes, but such does not yet exist and the seeker after information can only absorb the occasional kernel of fact out of the vast mass of controversial literature.

Most of the acts referred to have been passed within the last decade, yet it would be a mistake to suppose that they originated spontaneously during this period, and indeed there is much less that is entirely new about them than is generously supposed. What is new I think fall chiefly under two heads—the providing increased administrative machinery for the application by the courts of established principles and recognized powers, such as the suspension of sentence, the results of which have been generally beneficial and the entire disregard so far as the acts themselves go of any established legal principles and the absence of any limitations on the arbitrary powers of the court which always involves dangerous possibilities. The probation system which is one of the essential features of the Juvenile Court was perhaps earliest developed in Massachusetts. Probation had been in operation in that State to a limited extent prior to 1869, but in that year a statute was passed creating a State visiting agency for children's institutions which was to have a representative in court at the trial of all juvenile offenders and providing that all children's cases should be heard and determined by themselves, separate from the general and ordinary business of said courts. This act was held constitutional. In 1867 the Legislature of Illinois, in "An Act in Reference to the Reform School of the City of Chicago," provided that "whenever any public magistrate or Justice of the Peace shall have brought before him any boy or girl between the ages of six and sixteen years, who he has reason to believe is a vagrant, or is destitute of proper parental care, or is growing up in mendicancy, ignorance, idleness or vice," he shall cause such boy or girl to be arrested and, together with the witnesses, taken before one of the Judges of the Superior or Circuit Courts of Cook County, and "if upon such examination, such Judge shall be of opinion that said boy or girl is a proper subject for commitment to the Reform School, and that his or her moral welfare and the good of society require that he or she should be sent to said school for employment, instruction, and reformation, he shall so decided, * * * and such child shall thereupon be committed." This act was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of Illinois in 1871 in the case of People vs. Turner. In the opinion Judge Thornton considered the act repugnant to parental rights, but based the decision on the constitutional right of a minor as well as an adult to liberty, except as punishment for crime. He said: "It is claimed that the law is administered for the moral welfare and intellectual improvement of the minor, and the good of society * * * If, without crime, without the conviction of any offense, the children of the State are to be thus confined for the good of society, then society had better be reduced to its original elements and free government acknowledged a failure. In cases of writs of habeas corpus to bring up infants, there are other rights beside the rights of the father. If improperly or illegally restrained, it is our duty exdebito justitiae to liberate. The welfare and rights of the child are also to be considered. The disability of minors does not make slaves or criminals of them. They are entitled to legal rights and are under legal disabilities. * * * Minors are bound to pay taxes for the support of the Government, and constitute a part of the militia, and are compelled to endure the hardships and privations of a soldiers' life in defense of the constitution and the laws, and yet it is assumed that to them liberty is a mere chimera. It is something of which they may have dreamed, but have never enjoyed the fruition. Can we hold children responsible for crime; liable for their torts; impose onerous burdens upon them, and yet deprive them of the enjoyment of liberty without charge or conviction of crime? The bill of rights declares that all men are by nature free and independent and have certain inherent and inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. * * * Shall we say to the children of the State, you shall not enjoy this right, a right independent of all human laws and regulations? It is declared in the constitution, is higher than constitution and law, and should be held forever sacred." As a proposition of strict constitutional law the position of Judge Thornton is unanswerable, but how far we have travelled from that position is indicated by the language of the Supreme Court of Michigan, in the case of Robinson vs. Wayne, Circuit Judges decided in 1908, which referred to the Turner case as "now chiefly notable as an example of the vigor with which that which is not the law may be stated." The Turner case is typical of many others during the next thirty years. The various Legislatures passed numerous acts in which can be traced the fuller development of the socialistic idea that the abstract political entity we call the State is a sort of artificial parent of all minors with rights over them superior to any rights of the natural parents or of the minors themselves; that it is the duty of the State to control and supervise the education both mental and moral of all children and for such purpose may dispose of their custody, fix their status and confine in an institution provided only the primary purpose be not punishment for something done but reformation or improvement. This is the basis upon which such acts have been sustained. In fact it is in the language of Prof. Pound, extra-legal attainment of just results while preserving the form of the law.

This legislative tendency was long resisted by the courts from the standpoint of the rights of the minor himself. The tendency of the courts was individualistic and to support the right of the minor to his liberty as against the State except after conviction of crime subject only to the rights of parents. In all questions as to the custody of children the courts adopted as a basic principle the good of the child and treated the minor as the subject of rights and duties and only under certain disabilities.

In 1893 the Pennsylvania Legislature passed an act providing that no child under sixteen years of age under restraint or conviction should be placed in any apartment or cell of any prison or place of confinement or in any courtroom during the trial of adults charged with or convicted of crime and that all cases involving the trial or commitment of children for any crime or misdemeanor before any Magistrate or Justice of the Peace or in any court may be heard and determined by such Court at suitable times to be designated therefor by it separate and apart from the trial of other criminals' cases, of which sessions a separate docket and record shall be kept. In declaring this act unconstitutional Judge Yerkes, of Bucks County, said: "It is quite probable that this act became a law through inadvertence. It represents humanitarianism gone mad and is so clumsily drawn that it is next to impossible to understand its clear meaning. * * * It is fortunate for those who have the burden of taxation to bear that there is a restriction in the organic law against this extravagant legislation. The Constitution of the Commonwealth declares that trial by jury shall be as heretofore, that all courts shall be open and that all laws relating to the courts shall be general and of uniform operation." Similar legislation was passed in New York in 1892 and in Rhode Island in 1898.

In the British Colony of South Australia a State Children's Department was created at Adelaide in 1895 and three years later a Juvenile Court was opened there for the trial of persons under eighteen, though the system of probation officers was not introduced. A Juvenile Court was also established at Toronto, Canada, on the South Australian model. The first distinctively Juvenile Court in the United States was established in Chicago in 1899. The act providing for this Court contained most of the provisions which have become familiar in the acts passed from time to time in the various States, some twenty of which, I believe now have Juvenile Court laws. In 1901 a complete Juvenile Court law was passed in Pennsylvania. This act was held unconstitutional by the Superior Court in Mansfield's case, 22 Sup. 224, on the grounds of being insufficient in title because (1) the title contained no intimation that it was the purpose of the act to deal with the treatment and control of all children; (2) and no intimation that it changed the whole course of judicial procedure as to delinquent children, in criminal proceedings and actions for penalties, nor that it changes the punishment or penalty of every offense, arising at common law or created by statute or municipal ordinance; that it was class legislation and that it offended against the constitutional provisions that no person shall for any indictable offense be proceeded against criminally by information and that trial by jury shall be as heretofore. The Court called attention to the fact that under the provisions of the act a boy who plays a jews-harp or mouth organ upon a public street becomes a dependant child and may until he is twenty-one years of age, be consigned to the care of some charitable person or institution and that while the natural rights of parents had not been preserved by the declaration of rights from legislative annihilation the provisions of the act went far beyond anything that could reasonably be inferred in the title. It also said: "While the offense remains indictable and persons who are sui juris are, without any action on their part, secure in the right of a jury trial, an act of assembly which requires that a boy fourteen years of age shall make a formal affirmative demand in order to secure a jury trial when charged with such an offense is such a clog upon the right as to involve a violation of the constitutional guaranty."

Mansfield's case having been decided in 1903 the Legislature of that year passed another Juvenile Court act in which some of the constitutional objections to the Act of 1901 were avoided. Instead of creating a new Juvenile Court the Act of 1903 conferred on the Courts of Quarter Sessions "full Jurisdiction in all proceedings affecting the treatment and control of dependent, neglected, incorrigible, and delinquent children, under the age of sixteen years" and defined a dependent and neglected child to be "any child who is destitute, homeless, abandoned, or dependent upon the public for support, or who has not proper parental care or guardianship, and delinquent child, as any child who may be charged with the violation of any law of this Commonwealth or the ordinance of any city, borough, or township." It also applied to all children under the age of sixteen. In some other respects, however, it would seem to be more offensive than the Act of 1901. Thus the Court is not required to make any adjudication of anything or render any judgment; "at the hearing, the Judge or Judges holding such session of the Court shall determine, after an inquiry into the facts, what order for the commitment and custody and care of the child, the child's own good and the best interests of the State may require; and may commit such child to the care of its parents subject to the supervision of a probation officer, or to some suitable institution, or the care of some reputable citizen of good moral character, or to the care of some training school, or the care of some association willing to receive it." Although the Curt may make an order upon the parents to contribute to the support of any child committed "such sum as the Court may determine" and any association or individual to whom a child is committed becomes the guardian of the child and may consent to its legal adoption, there is no provision for notice to the parents except that "it shall be within the power of the Judge to make all necessary orders for compelling the production of such child, and the attendance of the parents and all persons having the custody or control of the child or with whom the child may be." The powers of the Court are to be exercised upon the petition of any citizen or when any Magistrate in the case of a child arrested for an indictable offense or the District Attorney or the Court upon the trial shall certify or be of the opinion that "the good of the child and the interests of the State" do not require a prosecution or conviction. There is not even the provision of the Act of 1901 that a jury may be demanded. Nevertheless, in the case of Commonwealth vs. Fisher, 27 Sup. 175, the Superior Court held that the Act of 1903 "offends against none of the provisions of the Constitution." It held the title sufficient, that a new court was not created and that it was not class legislation. As to the right of trial by jury, the charge in this case being larceny, the Court said: "If trial by jury had been desired in this particular case it was only necessary for the defendant, his father, or attorney or any other person on his behalf, to have made formal demand therefor and had it made matter of record and, if denied, of exception, in order to raise a concrete question for adjudication." President Judge Rice and Judge Porter, who wrote the opinion in the Mansfield case dissented from this decision and the case was appealed to the Supreme Court, where the judgment of the Superior Court was affirmed, 213 p 48. The Supreme Court said: "In pressing the objection that the appellant was not taken into custody by due process of law, the assumption, running through the entire argument is continued that the proceedings of the Act of 1903 are of a criminal nature for the punishment of offenders for crimes committed and that the appellant was so punished. But he was not, and could not have been without due process of law, for the constitutional guaranty is that no one charged with a criminal offense shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. To save a child from becoming a criminal, or from continuing in a career of crime, to end in maturer years in public punishment and disgrace, the Legislature may surely provide for the salvation of such a child, if its parents or guarnian be unable or unwilling to do so, by bringing it into one of the courts of the State without any process at all, for the purpose of subjecting it to the State's guardianship and protection. The natural parent needs no process to temporarily deprive his child of its liberty by confining it in his own house to save it and shield it from the consequences of peristence in a career of waywardness, nor is the State when compelled, as parents patriae, to take the place of the father for the same purpose, required to adopt any process as a means of placing its hands upon the child to lead it into one of its courts. When the child gets there and the Court, with the power to save it, determines on its salvation and not its punishment, it is immaterial how it got there." As to the question of jury trial the Court said: "But there was no trial for any crime here and the act is operative only when there is to be no trial, the Legislature denies the child no right of a trial by jury for the simple reason that, by the act, it is not to be tried for anything. The design is not punishment nor the restraint imprisonment any more than is the wholesome restraint which a parent exercises over his child. Every statute which is designed to give protection, care and training to children, as a needed substitute for parental authority and performance of parental duty is but a recognition of the duty of the State as the legitimate guardian and protector of children where other guardianship fails." According to this decision the constitutional guaranty against deprivation of life, liberty, or property without due process of law is limited to persons charged with a criminal offense.

One of the latest Juvenile Court acts is the one passed by the New York Legislature of 1910, for Monroe County, in which is the city of Rochester. This act has been recommended as a model act by the Russell Sage Foundation. This most advanced step in the socialization of the domestic relations has, however, been somewhat criticized. Mr. T. D. Hurley, of Chicago, who was identified with the early Juvenile Court legislation in Illinois, in an article widely copied in the public press, has vigorously criticized this act. He asserts that certain fundamental principles should not be infringed by any Juvenile Court, and among them he places "that the parent is entitled to the control, custody, and education of his child as against the whole world, and until he forfeits this right no power can interfere with him; that the parent should be made a formal party to any proceeding where the custody of his child is at issue and should be given a full and fair opportunity to be heard in the case; the proceedings should be conducted in the presence of the parents, their legal representatives and friends, both parents and children should be confronted with their accusers and be afforded the right to cross-examine the witnesses in the case; there is no room nor place in this country, nor should there be any room, for 'star chamber' sessions in any court, much less a Juvenile Court, where the status of a child is being fixed possibly for life." He continues: "The foregoing principles are well understood by not only the lawyer, but also the layman. They meet with the hearty approval of all liberty-loving people. They require no authority to substantiate their validity. They are self-evident statements of the law that are based on common sense and justice. Any man or set of men or women who cannot indorse them are dangerous, not only to the particular community, but a menace to the entire country. Throughout the law the State is made supreme master over the child. The parent is only incidentally considered; he is not made a party to the proceedings, nor is he charged with neglect or inability to care for his child. The State is made to occupy the position of primary parent with rights superior to that of the natural parent. This is a false and vicious position to take. There is no law or authority to substantiate this doctrine. The rights of the parent are superior to those of the State, and, until the parent forfeits these rights, the State cannot interfere with his control or custody of the child. Parental rights should not only be protected, but, as far as practicable, preserved."

Archbishop Glennon, of St. Louis, is recently quoted as follows: "We have the right to preserve our homes from State control. We have the right to remain free and not to become tenants of a soulless State. We utterly abhor the doctrine that the little children who bless our homes shall be wards of the State, common property. The idea of common parentage is not only the end of order, but the end of civilization itself."

The attempt has been made to connect the authority over children given by these statutes with the jurisdiction exercised over minors by the Court of Chancery in England and by equity and probate courts in this county, but this cannot successfully be done. The chancery jurisdiction originated in the feudal relation of lord and vasal and was exercised principally to secure to the king his feudal dues. The extension of it in this country was purely individualistic and simply to supply the want of natural guardianship. The effort has been to get away from the idea of criminal proceedings. After all is said and done, however, the large number of cases dealt with by the Juvenile Courts are criminal or quasi-criminal in character. And in such cases there is a very real deprivation of liberty nor is that fact changed by refusing to call it punishment or because the welfare of the child is intended to be promoted. In the good old days the parent who did not spare the rod usually called attention, I have been told, to the fact that it was applied "for the good of the child," but this argument, I imagine, was never very convincing to the subject.

It is apparent, I think, that some considerable readjustment is necessary before these statutes can be logically fitted into our legal system and not be as they are now, extra-legal expedients. There are some features of these laws which we will never be willing to give up, but there are some, I think, that should and will be changed. The probation system and the whole administrative system provided for enabling the Court to exercise supervision over the delinquent juvenile is generally acknowledged to be a great advance and will be still further improved. The vague and unlimited nature of the powers granted to the Court would seem to call for further definition and specification. It has even been proposed to constitute laymen Juvenile Court Judges. In regard to such a proposal the Supreme Court of Utah said in Mill v. Brown: "The Judge of any court, and especially a Judge of a Juvenile Court, should be willing at all times, not only to respect, but to maintain and preserve the legal and natural rights of men and children alike. * * * The fact that the American system of government is controlled and directed by laws, not men, cannot be too often or too strongly impressed upon those who administer any branch or part of the government. Where a proper spirit and good judgment are followed as a guide, oppression can and will be avoided. * * * The Juvenile Court law is of such vast importance to the State and society that it seems to us it should be administered by those who are learned in the law and versed in the rules of procedure, to the end that the beneficient purposes of the law may be made effective and individual rights respected. Care must be exercised in both selection of a Judge and in the administration of the law."

Judge Mack, in an address before the American Bar Association, said: "This decision but emphasizes the dangers that beset the path of the Juvenile Court. The public at large, sympathetic with the work and even the probation officers who are not lawyers regard him as one having almost autocratic power. Because of the extent of his jurisdiction and the tremendous responsibility that it entails it is, in my judgment, absolutely essential that he be a trained lawyer, thoroughly imbued with the doctrine that ours is a government of laws and not of men."

But this is not enough; it should not rest with the personality of the Judge whether or not he shall wield autocratic power. There should be clear definitions and limitations in the acts themselves of the powers with which he is invested. While with the right man in the right place the very indefiniteness of his powers may be productive of immediate good, in the long run it will be just as unsafe as experience proved it to be in the criminal law. The corporal punishments and other abuses that have developed in some of our Juvenile Courts are sufficient indications of what will be inevitable in the future.

The principal trouble with these acts, it seems to me, is the confusion in them of different functions. The view is gaining general recognition that the Juvenile Court should not have jurisdiction in the case of dependent children. In such cases there is no need for the machinery of a court and no questions for a court to determine. Judge Mack, in the address just quoted from, says: "While in most jurisdictions the Juvenile Court laws make provision for the dependent as well as the neglected, the truant, and the delinquent child, some of the best workers in this field have objected to a court having anything to do with the strictly dependent child, the child whose parents must ask assistance merely because of poverty or misfortune. If friends or the church fail to supply the necessary help and the aid of the State is to be sought, it should be granted through poor law or relief commissioners." Mr. Bernard Flexner, in an address before the American Academy of Political and Social Science, said in relation to the "dependent or destitute child, the child whose case presents to the Judge the single question of relief. Most of the laws, as they now exist, embrace such children and there are few courts in which cases of this kind do not now arise. They are not properly cases for the court and should not reach the court. They should be cared for by organized relief agencies and should reach the court only when the question of parental neglect enters in." Such cases can be far better dealt with by the administrative agency of the Poor Directors than by a court. But there are besides that two very distinct fields embraced in most Juvenile Court acts and confusion between them. The one is the field of crime, the other that of status. In the one case the court is dealing with crime, in the other with status; that is, determining the custody of the child or its relations to its family or the State. The child who comes into court accused of crime inevitably stands on a different footing from one who is there merely from parental neglect or from incorrigibility—and should. The New York Juvenile Court deals only with criminal cases. In my judgment, the Juvenile Court should deal only with questions of status, with questions of the custody and the control of the child. All criminal questions should be dealt with by a criminal court. Every child accused of crime should be tried and be subject to neither punishment or restraint of liberty unless convicted. No child should be restrained simply because he has been accused of crime, whether he is guilty or not. If convicted, he can then be turned over to the Juvenile Court to determine in a proper proceeding, with the rights of all parties safeguarded, whether a change in his custody or status would be for his best interests. In this way the Juveniue Court might become truly a court of equity dealing with one class of questions upon established principles. Some such reconstruction of the Juvenile Court system, to bring it into confomity with legal principles, is urgently called for. Although constitutional provisions here have not been able to prevent the overriding of established principles in the enthusiastic adoption of the Juvenile Court laws, we cannot afford to allow them to be thus overridden even with a laudable purpose in view. Nothing that is valuable in these acts need be lost in such a reconstruction, and we shall then have "the good of the child and the best interests of the State" conserved not only within the forms but the spirit and the fundamental principles of the law.

Mr. Lindsey's able paper was received with hearty applause.

Following the reading of this paper the convention was favored with a further selection by the orchestra.

President Ochse tendered the thanks of the convention to the Orchestra and to the Glee Club for their selections.

Dr. Carl Kelsey, of the University of Pennsylvania here addressed the convention on the subject, "Our Responsibility for the Mentally Crippled." He said:

ADDRESS OF DR. KELSEY.

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen.

I came in this morning just in time to hear the gentleman who greeted us on behalf of the city say that he never realized how much charity was needed until he saw the delegates to this convention. At this time of the evening I shall have to ask for a double dose of that charity on the part of those present.

In the older philosophy there was a sort of a notion that all adults were more or less equal. It was recognized there was not a full equality in intellectual gifts or physical strength, but that somehow there must be an equality of moral responsibility. The idea was the result of the development and preservation of individual rights—a very necessary notion—and it took a long time to get it thoroughly established as a principle of our law. Yet there came, in spite of those principles, a gradual recognition that individuals were different; that from time to time some of them were seized with various and sundry obsessions; sometimes they were harmless and sometimes very dangerous to society—as, for instance, when men steadily decline and die because they believe they have been conjured and that only the person that put that spell on them could remove it. Or, it may be the obsession that there is some one thing which is the basis of all wrong on earth; whether it is with reference to alcohol, or tobacco, or anything else; or the obsession that there is some efficient medicine that will cure all human ills, whether that is Christian Science or Paine's Celery Compound, or anything else. Those may be more or less harmless obsessions, though they may result in the upsetting of the mental balance of the individual.

On the good side is the power of the fixed ideal, which becomes one's guide and standard and influences him through life.

But I am dealing to-night, primarily, with a group of people who are not normal; or those who, if they were normal at first, have ceased to be normal—the mentally crippled, or the insane and the epileptic and the feeble-minded.

The insane are by all odds the most numerous, possibly the most important; but the other groups, particularly the feeble-minded group, carry one of the most serious challenges to the future of the human race.

I cannot take the time to describe the various types of these individuals in any detail. Epilepsy starts in a rather rare seizure or fit, and may become more and more common, until they may take place, in extreme cases, several times a day, and then the mind of the sufferer is seriously affected and probably gone beyond recovery. We do not know what epilepsy is; whether it is some sort of an occult disease (the ancients used to call it the sacred disease)—but we do know that if it is taken early enough, and the epileptic put under out-of-door life with regular food and exercise, that it is not incurable.

What we ordinarily do is to wait until the mind of the epileptic is affected, and then send him to the insane asylum. It is no credit to us that we wait until the disease has gone so far that nothing but the insane asylum or the almshouse is open to him.

Insanity, as we have heard to-day, is increasing with frightful rapidity. It was almost unknown among the negroes, before the Civil War; it has increased more than a hundred per cent a decade since the war. Then is it something that is inherited and directly passed from one generation to another, or is insanity?—I am tempted to say insanities, for we include many different conditions, and the term is blind and misleading when we think of it as covering the whole class—is the result of poor stock reproducing itself, and how much of it is the result of vice on the part of normal stock? At the present time we recognize there are three great causes of insanity. They are alcohol, disease (chiefly syphilis), and worry. All three preventable. Does it mean that we are attempting to live under conditions to which our nervous system is not adapted, so that when put to this constant strain it must break and we have insanity? Perfectly possible, and therefore in large measure preventable if we will throw our knowledge on the care and treatment of the insane to the care and treatment of the normal, for I cannot understand why we are so frequently told to take care of the weak, the insane, and the feeble-minded, and then tell the normal boy or girl to go to the devil. It is infinitely more important to see that the conditions of normal children are right, and that the conditions of normal men and women are right. (Applause).

Feeble-mindedness is apparently not a disease or the result of disease, under ordinary conditions, but is rather a natural, though unfortunate, variation of the human stock.

We used to think we were all more or less of an approximately equal moral responsibility. We are gradually coming to realize that there is a great army of men and women who are so different from the rest of us that they cannot accomplish the individual development that is easy for the rest of us. Take the three groups of the feeble-minded—the idiot type, whose mental development doesn't go beyond the normal child of two years; the imbeciles, ranging from the mental age of about two to ten, and now we are discovering that we have another group whose sense of moral reponsibility will never be beyond that of a normal child of twelve or thirteen, whom we are beginning to call the moron group, which is the old classical word meaning fool. Now this higher type, particularly, is the one from which the greatest danger comes, because they are so nearly like the rest of us that not until we apply the finer tests are we able to identify them. The idiot does not necessarily come from feeble-minded stock but seldom lives to maturity. We may occasionally find such cases in normal families, occurring from some cause of which they may have no knowledge. But the danger comes from the moron stock. You ask what is the danger? I would rely: That a large percentage of the men and women who are haled before the bar of Justice and sentenced as criminals are feeble-minded, and our prisons teem with feeble-minded. They are treated as normal, but they are not normal and cannot be made normal by any process of medicine or surgery. A very considerable percentage of the prostitutes on the streets are high-grade feeble-minded women, but we send them into our reformatories, then place them out into families and are astonished that they do not behave as ordinary children behave.

I want to tell a little of the history of a girl who is in an institution in a neighboring city. The executives knew nothing of that girl, except that she, and probably her mother, were feeble-minded. They started out to investigate, and if I should put all of this family chart on one sheet it would reach across this room and I would have a thousand individuals represented on it. They found that a feeble-minded man married a feeble-minded woman, with a result of five feeble-minded children and six who died in infancy. Now this woman becomes the head of our family. She has a child by a man in the almshouse, an official or employee, and the child dies in infancy. She has relations then with a normal man and the result is the feeble-minded girl in the institution. She has relations with another man, the child dying in infancy; still later with a feeble-minded man of rather high-grade and the result is again feeble-mindedness. She later has a second husband, with the result of three feeble-minded children, one dying in infancy, one still-birth, and two others about whom information has not been gotten. Now the story of this case shows how this has happened. When the people of the little town where she lived discovered that she was having immoral relations with these men they said, "Now that isn't right; we must take her to the preacher and have him pronounce the benediction of God upon them and have them married" (for you know all marriages are made in heaven) and so that was done. The woman went to work for a farmer, and it was soon discovered that she was having improper relations with him. Again conventionalities must be observed, so after securing a divorce she is taken to the minister who performs a marriage to the second man, with the result that there are more feeble-minded children to be cared for.

I am sure that that minister was not serving the Lord, and his code of morals and his notion that the conventional standard was the thing to be preserved, rather than the integrity of the human race, is an idea that some day we will see to be awful.

Nearly all the feeble-mindedness we have comes from feeble-minded stock. We can allow the feeble-minded to run wild, as we have, particularly the higher grades, attempting at times to hold them up to moral standards, or we can take care of them and prevent them from becoming parents. (Applause).

Personally, I must confess I am at a loss, not to explain the attitude but to find any sympathy in my heart with those leaders of the State who from time to time prevent us from asexualizing the males who are liable to become parents. (Applause). I am informed it was the opposition of one of the great religious bodies of the State that defeated that in the Legislature. Because it meant the deforming of the human form divine.

But the danger does not come chiefly from the feeble-minded man, but from the feeble-minded woman of child-bearing age. And there is no excuse for our dodging our responsibility and allowing feeble-minded women to be at large in the community with the almost certain result that they will procreate their kind.

You may be sure, if the feeble-minded do not appear in the second generation, in a cross between a normal-minded man and a feeble-minded woman, you will get it in the third or fourth generation.

I would like to go on and point out certain definite directions in which at the present time we ought to be doing something for the bettering of conditions. If you know of any higher thing than the maintaining of a sound mind in a sound body, for the maintaining of the human race on earth, you know something I do not know. If you don't think this is as important as to maintain any of the ordinary social conventionalities or to prepare a man for the next world—which we hope will be satisfactory—I am sorry. Is it the mission of religion on earth to try to grab a few drowning sinners out of the pond while everywhere the conditions are forcing thousands of others into the pond; or is it a higher religious principle to say we are going to stop this thing at the source? The source, I think, is the horrible notion that a human being kept alive by our efforts, when he reaches physical maturity, is to be allowed to become the parent of another generation, and to send his defects down through all time. That doesn't seem rational.

In the olden times when we didn't have our charitable institutions, and when we were obliged to earn our own living, rather than to inherit our estates, there was little chance for the man or woman who was mentally crippled to keep up the pace, and the inability to keep up the pace, by the average man, meant that there was no chance for the creation of a weakling type of human beings. They were killed off. Which is wiser? To kill off by neglect those few individuals who cannot keep up with the average group, or by maintaining the feeble-minded, to commit social suicide, by developing a burden that no community can carry? We haven't perhaps faced that yet, but we may be much nearer that situation than we realize. If England, to-day, where it has been necessary to repeatedly lower the army requirements in order to get any recruits at all, or if Pennsylvania found it necessary to close our recruiting stations in the coal regions because the men did not come up to the standard of the men wanted in the Army at the time of the Spanish War, are we dealing with a group of individuals who are the result of defective ancestry or with a group that, generation after generation, have been subjected to bad living conditions? If we are dealing with a group who come from a defective ancestry then no system of education and no school of education will change that type. Weaklings they will remain. If, on the other hand, they are normal individuals who have been merely living stunted lives, improperly fed and housed, it means if you will take that stock and give the next generation a chance to live a normal and decent life it will soon come up to the old standard.

That means, simply, that you and I are what we are not because of what our ancestors thought or hoped or did, but because of what our ancestors were; and there is a fundamental difference between the two. Did they belong in the feeble-minded group? Then most of us are there, and there is no escape. Did they belong in the normal group? Then we belong in the normal group, for nothing that you do directly affects anything more than the environment in which your child lives. Whether your parents went to heaven or to hell is a matter of absolute indifference to you physically. Whatever their habits were is a matter of indifference, so far as the racial stock is concened. If, however they poisoned the blood in your veins, or starved your body or your soul, and robbed you of ideals—these are problems with which we can do something. The problems of heredity can be solved only by preventing the reproduction of poor stock and securing the reproduction of the good.

The problems of environment can be modified and possibly solved, whenever we get ready to change the environment.

President Ochse: I am sure we are all pleased to be able to-night to hear the excellent papers and the address of Dr. Kelsey, and I want to thank the audience for the good attention given. It shows that we all appreciated them.

Dr. Srodes: I would respectfully move that a resolution be offered thanking Dr. Kelsey for his able address.

Dr. Kelsey: I am an active member now, and I consider that very much out of place.

Upon motion the convention was here adjourned until 9:15 to-morrow morning.

MORNING SESSION.

Wednesday, October 11, 1911.

The convention was called to order at 9 a. m. by President Ochse.

Prayer was offered by the Rev. Dr. S. F. Crawford, as follows:

Almighty God, our Father, we are all Thy children. Thou dost care for us with an infinite care. Thou art the Father of the widow and the orphan, and we praise Thee for all Thy goodness and mercy toward us. For Thy loving kindness, for the revelation of Thy tender mercy and Thy love to the children of men, and, above all, we thank Thee for the revelation of Thyself, in Thy Son Jesus Christ, who came into this world that we might be uplifted and cared for, that we might all live the life that is everlasting. We do thank Thee that as the spirit of the Master kindles in the hearts of men they feel the great truth that no man lives unto himself, but that he is ever in the world to care for others; that he is his brother's keeper. Oh, Lord, we pray Thee that Thy spirit may more and more kindle in the hearts of the children of men, that they may feel they owe a great debt to those who are in need. We do thank Thee for the spirit of charity, of benevolence, of Divine love; and we pray Thee that Thou wouldst especially bless this organization. May Thy richest blessings rest upon all her officers and members. May Thy richest blessings rest upon the work of this Association and upon all who are engaged in it.

Now abideth faith, hope, and charity, but the greatest of these is charity. Hear our prayer, pardon our sins, bless us with richest blessings to-day. We ask it in Jesus' name. Amen.

President Ochse: I have the pleasure of announcing that we have with us the Honorable John P. Elkin, of Indiana, who will talk to us.

Judge Elkin was received with applause, and said:

ADDRESS OF JUDGE ELKIN.

Mr. President, Ladies, and Gentlemen.

I do not intend to weary you with an address. I came here as a citizen of this beautiful little town, lying in the lap of the mountains, to bid you welcome to our midst. I regret that I did not have the pleasure of standing before you at the commencement of your exercises and bidding you welcome. I spend two-thirds of my time away from home and one-third of it here, but I have more pleasure and comfort here than in any other place in the world.

We sometimes think we do not appreciate what a great State we have. Think of Ireland; it is not as big as Pennsylvania. Ireland has only four million people and we have eight million, and yet you find the Irish in every part of the world.

Pennsylvania is an empire, rich beyond compare. There is no other State in the Union that has so many comforts of a material kind as Pennsylvania.

We ought to feel proud of our State. Our men and women are made of splendid stock. Around Philadelphia the old Quakers settled. That is splendid and sturdy stock that has left an impress upon all the institutions of Pennsylvania. They were sturdy and upright and capable. Pennsylvania can always point with pride to its Quaker stock.

Then we have the Scotch-Irish. The home of the Scotch-Irish was in the Cumberland Valley, but many have settled right here in Indiana. They came here across the mountains, and they have built up a splendid community. Then we have the German stock. And now we are getting the population of the south of Europe, and they are giving this country some great problems. We often hear the question whether this country is going to come off victorious. We have met many crises, and we shall have many crises to meet in the future, but we have met and have solved every problem that has faced the American people, and we will meet and solve all the problems that may come before us. (Applause.) To doubt the perpetuity of American institutions is to doubt the ability of man to govern himself.

Hon. JOHN P. ELKIN

One of the Justices of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, Who Took a Great Interest in the Convention at Indiana, and Who, with Mrs. Elkin, Entertained the Members So Royally.

I am glad to see you here. I came to say to you that your enterprising Secretary waited upon Mrs. Elkin and myself some months ago, and we agreed upon a plan of co-operation by which we could add a little to your pleasure. It was arranged that we have a reception at our house to-night. I want to look you in the face and extend the right hand of fellowship, and I want you all to come to our house at 8 o'clock and stay as long as you want to. I don't care whether you come in full dress or half dress or how; come as you are. You are all invited. We can take care of 200 or 300. We didn't issue any formal invitations; we didn't know who to issue them to, but you are all cordially welcome. Come and see us. (Applause).

President Ochse: I know you all appreciate the kindness of Judge Elkin, and we will all be there.

The convention here listened to the following interesting paper on "The Child's World" by Edwin D. Solenberger, of Philadelphia, General Secretary of the Children's Aid Society of Pennsylvania:

PAPER BY MR. SOLENBERGER.

I suppose the Program Committee desires a discussion of the environment in which these children live who are the objects of the care of the various organizations represented in this Association.

The subject of the relative influence of heredity and environment, upon children has received much discussion. So far as our daily work is concerned we are immediately confronted with the problem of environment, rather than heredity. We cannot control the heredity of the child; we may, however, by surrounding it with the proper environment, have some influence upon the question of heredity in the future. We have many cases which demonstrate the undoubted influence of good or bad environment upon the child during its years of growth. Certain influences are so positive and their results so apparent that it becomes the urgent duty of everyone who has to deal with unfortunate children to give earnest thought to this question of environment.

Some years ago I visited an institution in Cincinnati, Ohio. I was shown two photographs: one of a woman who had developed into a criminal and whose children were paupers; the the other of a woman of fine type with her husband and child. The Superintendent told me that years before an agent had been sent to get two children out of a river-boat—they called them "wharf rats." One of the girls had gotten away, and the other was received. The latter was the picture of one of these girls who had grown into this good woman, and the other the picture of the girl who had remained with the "wharf rats" and grown up in that environment.

I have here an extract from something that Luther Burbank has written in his suggestive little book, "The Training of the Human Plant." He says: "To the extent that we leave the children of the poor and these other unfortunates—waifs and foundlings—to themselves and their evil surroundings, to that extent we breed peril for ourselves. * * * Begin training these outcasts, begin the cultivation of them, if you will, much as we cultivate the plants, in order that their lives may be turned into right ways, in order that the integrity of the State may be maintained. Rightly cultivated, these children may be made a blessing to the race; trained in the wrong way, or neglected entirely, they will become a curse to the State. * * * All animal life is sensitive to environment, but of all living things the child is the most sensitive. * * * A child absorbs environment. It is the most susceptible thing in the world to influence, and if that force be applied rightly and constantly when the child is in its most susceptive condition, the effect will be pronounced, immediate and permanent.

Those are the words of a man who has done more than any other man in our generation to show what can be accomplished in the vegetable world in the matter of training and development.

We are familiar with how our domestic animals have been produced from earlier stock, that was wild. There are many things we do not know about environment, but we do know that when children are living in demoralizing surroundings that such influence counts manyfold more against a child than it does in the case of an adult. It makes a great difference to the future of the State and to the common welfare, whether or not these children are cared for properly. No one can compute the loss to the State and to society of permitting children to live in surroundings that cause them to grow up paupers and criminals.

There is another principle involved: Sometimes one hears it said that these children and their parents have sinned, and that society owes them nothing. That they have brought their condition upon themselves and that any kind of care is good enough for them, and is all they deserve. Grant that it is good enough; if it doesn't bring them into right living it is the most expensive care for the community. We only add a burden to society by that method.

There is another and a more serious problem: Every boy and girl that grows up in surroundings that are bad for himself or herself produces a condition that is bad for the rest of the community and becomes a source of contamination for the other children of the community. I think here is a justification for the expenditure on the part of public officers of funds for the care of such children, although I am not ready to advocate that the State should give parental care to a large section of our population.

We have in Pennsylvania a marked tendency toward an increase in our urban population. The county in which we are holding this convention had a population of 42,556 in 1890 and 66,210 in 1910, an increase between 1890 and 1910 of over 23,000. But this is exceptional for a rural county. I have the record here of eighteen Pennsylvania counties, all counties which do not have large cities—and those eighteen counties in the last ten years have lost 28,817 people, while eight or ten of the larger cities have been growing by leaps and bounds. Think of it. Here is a problem for us to think about; the increase, relatively, of the cities, at the expense of the country. There are consequently more people in the cities to be fed, and apparently fewer people in the country districts to raise the food to feed them. That has a bearing on the cost of living. I am interested in the question of how we can place some of the children who need care, in these congested cities, back into these depleted country districts. I believe this is a subject that must engage our attention more and more in Pennsylvania. We have listened to the eloquent words of Judge Elkin as to this great Commonwealth, and I believe it is the grandest Commonwealth in the United States, but in common with other older States we have serious problems. I am interested in finding out the extent to which we may be able to bring back to the land, under proper conditions, the children who have gone from it. I think we never will bring that about until we recognize certain facts: one is that we must do something more than to take the untrained boy from the city and give him to a farmer, to work for the farmer. Of course the boy will not like it, if he is put there only to do hard work with little if any pay. Something must be done to make his life on the farm more attractive. When the rural social and economic conditions more nearly counterbalance those in the city it will be a great gain. We must make it an inducement for the boy or the girl to stay on the farm. I do not think it is wise to go on expending vast sums of money for the care of unfortunate children unless we make some effort to grapple with this question of the exodus of children from the country to the cities. In this connection we must recognize conditions that they will remain permanently. I think we will see the value of an agricultural training for boys of this class. They should be taught the best methods of agriculture so that they may obtain the best results from the land.

If these principles that I have referred to are correct, I believe there is a great future for Children's Aid Societies and all similar agencies in the State. We need to take a broad view of our work, and recognize that we are dealing with a problem greater than the mere care of children; that it has a social and eceonomic aspect. I hope to see the day when this problem will be given more earnest thought by men and women who will bring to the help of these societies the best that we have in the State. Much has been and is being done, but let us try to deal with the problem more effectively in the light of our increasing knowledge.

Mrs. J. H. Evans, of Oil City, read the following paper: "The Volunteer Worker in Dependent Children's Work."

PAPER BY MRS. J. H. EVANS.

I am asked to tell you briefly something about "Child Placing," as executed by the Children's Aid Society of Western Pennsylvania, and specially of the feature of "Volunteer Work." This body is unique as a charitable organization; it is without a home save the one modest office in the Free Dispensary building in Pittsburg. It is a chartered society and has auxiliaries working under the charter in twenty-three counties of Western Pennsylvania.

It is twenty-four years since the various auxiliaries took up this work. Most of the children who come to us are from the County Commissioners or Poor Directors, and are taken from the almshouses. Some are placed in boarding homes—that is carefully selected private families, mostly in the country, where we pay a moderate rate of board, until a good permanent home is secured.

When children are given to the society unreservedly as is frequently done, we find them free homes, that is homes where they are cared for with no expense to the society. If of school age they will be sent to school; if over that age they will be taught to work and thus fitted to earn their own living. Many who come to us need medical attention and often surgical treatment, these are carefully examined to learn if there is any disease whatever in its incipiency. Some are deficient mentally, these we place in hospitals and institutions. A certain per cent are adopted.

Those adopted are nearly always the very young. It is seldom we have one adopted after eight years of age. Therefore we insist upon adoption promptly, after the usual time given in which to decide if the child will suit the place, which is one year.

When any one applies to us for a child we require proper credentials as to their fitness, ability, etc., to care for and train a child; we also require three references from people who know these parties intimately, and lastly the home is investigated. When we are satisfied that the home is a good one in all respects we give the child to their care conditionally. We are careful to visit the child later on, and if all things are well it is permitted to remain, if not, it is removed. The parties some times object to the removal, but we consider the child's interest above all else.

This work has been systematically prosecuted through all these years by women, mothers largely. At the annual meeting of our organization in June, 1909, at Warren, Pa., twelve members were present who had engaged in the work twenty-three years. Some of us have grown gray in the service and become grandmothers; in the meantime their interest has never wavered, nor their enthusiasm abated, their labor has been given freely, ungrudgingly, and without pay.

Surely mothers with their sympathetic hearts and innate intuition can get at the facts in the various cases better than all the men in the universe, and we feel the service has been done for the love of humanity, not in the prefunctory way of paid workers along similar lines.

These children not only require food and shelter, but the personal love and care that will develop the mind and heart, the moral as well as intellectual training. The homeless, friendless child needs love and friendship quite as much as it needs bread and meat.

In the organization of this work a small amount of money was appropriated by the Legislature, there was then but the one society with headquarters at Philadelphia; after two or three years it was found this plan was not altogether satisfactory, the distance across our State was so great, and entailed so much time and expense for those who attended the meetings, it was decided to divide the counties into Eastern and Western Pennsylvania, each society then to receive its share of the appropriation. The work of Western Pennsylvania has been faithfully, successfully and systematically done all these years, voluntarily, but now a sound is heard in the top of the mulberry trees. It is claimed that efficient work cannot be done by the volunteers; paid workers are the only ones who can be depended upon, specially those of the masculine gender. At a gathering similar to this some months ago one speaker stated that "The women engaged in this work were bound to decay," hence their inability to perform the necessary duties pertaining to it; possibly the men have all taken a draught from Ponce de Leon's spring of perpetual youth and will never grow older, at least so long as the salary does not fail. When the women began this work, there was so small a fund to draw upon, and every dollar was needed for the maintenance of the children, that if the workers had required payment the work would soon have languished for lack of funds.

Will paid workers think you have the unceasing interest, infinite patience, and earnest desire for the child's well being, as the kindly disposed mothers who have so long labored for them?

Our work when introduced to the public by a devoted volunteer worker tends to create a warm personal interest in behalf of the child enlisting support, and leading to the placing of the child in a good foster-home.

When the work is managed as it should be the volunteer worker has the greater opportunity of winning the child's confidence and trust and thus to my mind insuring a faithful report of the conditions existing in the foster home.

Our system of visiting eliminates all official relations and can be made a friendly, loving co-operation for the best good of the child.

The volunteer worker who has the confidence of the community in which she lives has practically no limitations in her work, as she has but to ask and receive. To illustrate this I will relate a little personal experience. At home several of our liberal business men, realizing the good we are doing, give us their individual check annually for $25. One generous, great hearted man gives us money at all times and upon all occasions. If he chances to meet the Treasurer he inquires, "How is your work coming on?" And jokingly says, "I fear you are neglecting the babies. I have not given you money in a long time." Then he reaches in his vest pocket and produces either a five or ten dollar bill. If the Secretary inserts a notice in the daily papers asking for clothing he immediately telephones her to go to a certain department store and get whatever is needed and have the bill sent to him, adding, "I don't like to think those children are not properly clothed." On one occasion meeting the President and Secretary who happened to be on their way to a meeting of the society, he said, "What is new in the Children's Aid work? Don't you need some money?" Then he began searching his vest pocket and brought forth a bank note, twisted it up and tucked it in the President's glove. It proved to be of the $10.00 value. I have heard members of other auxiliaries testify of similar kindnesses. The average amount each auxiliary receives from the State appropriation is $100 per year, one or two counties receive more, Allegheny County with the large territory it covers, is one, and Fayette, which is largely a mining county, another. Besides the $100 from the State we have the membership fee of $1.00 each. The various auxiliaries give entertainments to augment their funds, but fortunately our many benevolent friends have kept us supplied with funds, which enables us to do so large amount of work. I am confident a paid worker, in our county at least, would not meet with the hearty support tendered us.

The one important desire of Western Pennsylvania is to perfect the township representation in each county, this will eventually be accomplished, so that each township will have its Children's Aid representatives prepared to visit and report to the county organization. This system when perfected we are sure will result in the opening of many homes, and insure to the society the careful oversight of the child, and safe guarding from abuse. One of our counties has this plan in excellent working order and finds it most helpful.

Since our organization 6,682 children have been under our care. During the last year to June 1, 1911, we have had 989; 49 were adopted in good homes and 11 married. With all the work accomplished there has been just two paid workers, the Actuary, who is employed by Western Pennsylvania and who devotes all her time to the office work, and the Secretary of Allegheny County, who likewise gives her entire time to the work. Can any organization produce a better showing? The total receipts from the State for the last two years was 12,250, from outside friends, 18,594. Our Legislature last term cut our appropriation to $10,000, but one county of Western Pennsylvania who holds aloof from us and works independently, had its appropriation increased to $150.00. Twenty-three counties receive $100.00 for two years, one county $150.00. Is this justice? Possibly the goddess allowed the bandage to slip from one eye the better to interview some of the Legislators. One of the best illustrations of our work perhaps, is right here in Indiana, our Industrial School for Girls, a living object lesson of which we are justly proud. In the beginning of this work many girls came to us untrained, ignorant of many things pertaining to real home life and utterly unfitted to be placed in a home; an industrial school was suggested, but there was no money to buy and equip such a place; finally, as the need became more urgent, it was decided that a committee should seek a suitable location, and the various counties would solicit funds from friends to pay for the property selected. Indiana presented the most advantageous and desirable building, nicely situated, not far from the beautiful campus of the Normal School; the price was thought to be reasonable, the building being a well built private residence which would require but little attention. The property was purchased in faith. The counties vied with each other in securing funds and finally the full amount was raised. A competent teacher and matron are employed and the girls are taught the various branches of domestic work and also have regular school hours, a well equipped schoolroom being one of the features. The Superintendent of this school has had supervision from the start and has given her undivided attention to it; the school was small the first two years; various plans had to be worked out and the auxiliaries educated as to methods, etc. It was a complicated problem, but one undefatigable Superintendent solved it and to-day our school stands alone, a most useful indispensible factor. The school is supported by the various auxiliaries from funds they receive from outside sources. Our Superintendent has given fifteen years of earnest, faithful service to the school, and all gratis. It has been a worry and responsibility many a time. On two or three occasions she has been called up in the wee small hours to take a train or drive across the country to recover some misguided girl, but she has always responded promptly; she has given the best years of her life, her very self to this cause and all for love of homeless, friendless girls. Shall I tell you her name? It is Mrs. Sue Williard, of this beautiful old town. The people of Indiana, too, are to be commended for their many and constant gifts to this school; our organization appreciates it and am glad to thank them in this public manner. It is most fortunate the school was located here, thereby securing the able supervision of Mrs. Williard, and the hearty co-operation and liberal aid of the citizens. It is doubtful if the same conditions could have been obtained anywhere else in our philanthropic old Commonwealth; certainly they could not have been surpassed. We are anxious you should all visit our school during your stay here; it is only a short distance, just ask any child you meet where Mrs. Williard's school is and they will direct you. Three hundred and fifty-five girls have been sent out from our school. This may not seem like a large number in fifteen years, but the class of girls must be considered. We could not get along without this school and only wish we had a similar one for boys. Perhaps some philanthropic friends will aid us in establishing one some day and then we will try to secure Mrs. Williard at her present salary to superintend that also. Volunteer work in this section of the State has been a success. In many of our great cities with their large and increasing population, paid workers are a necessity, but we feel we deserve due recognition for what we have accomplished and are still doing. We want our Legislators awakened to the magnitude of this work and show their approval by an increase of funds, instead of scaling it down to a paltry $100.00.

Prof. Thomas S. McLoney, Principal of the Blind School at Pittsburg, read the following paper on "The Future of the Blind," which was received with applause:

PAPER BY MR. McLONEY.

"The Future of the Blind."

Mr. President, Ladies, and Gentlemen.

In order to understand the future of the blind we must have at least some knowledge of their past as well as their present condition. Most of us receive our first impressions of the blind from the Good Book, which speaks of them at the gate of the temple or by the wayside begging. As they usually came from the poorer families, they were compelled to solicit alms as a means of support. The first ray of hope for the blind was given by the kind and sympathetic Savior, who while on earth had compassion on them and gave vision to their sightless eyes. He left for us an example to follow. Although we cannot give the blind physical sight, yet it is in our power to open up for them a vision of helpfulness, independence, and usefulness, which will bring hope, joy, and comfort into their lives.

For centuries the great mass of this afflicted class were everywhere mere objects of charity. They were left to procure a precarious subsistence by begging at the entrance of the temples and churches, in the church yards or by the wayside. Their infirmity was considered a sufficient cause to prevent them from enjoying the blessings of instruction or the benefits of industry. Discouraged by the apparent incapacity of the blind, men shrank from the task of endeavoring to combat the ills which their affliction has entailed upon them and to rescue them from the evils of idleness and the horrors of intellectual darkness. They were even allowed at times to become the objects of harsh and inhuman pastimes in the hands of vicious and ignorant people. Several spasmodic attempts were made to instruct the blind, but these met with very little success. There were individual blind men, who in spite of their terrible handicap achieved fame, but the great mass of them remained uneducated—dependent and helpless.

In the summer of 1783 the proprietor of a cafe in Paris, desirous of increasing his custom, procured the services of eight or ten blind persons whom he arrayed before a long desk, with goggles on nose and instruments in their hands. Upon the stand were placed open music books, and the sightless men, feigning to read their notes from these, executed at short intervals the most "discordant symphonies." The music drew a large crowd, who received the ridiculous performances with boisterous and heartless mirth, while consuming refreshments. Among the most interested bystanders was Valentine Hauy, the celebrated philanthropist, a man of large heart and head with a deep feeling for the woes of mankind. The scene led him to consider seriously the condition of the blind and whether or not some method of reading might be devised whereby the blind could gain knowledge for themselves and add to the oral instruction that was possible to be given them. Hauy at once began to gather all the information he could concerning the previous attempts made to educate the blind and he studied carefully the various devices used. He soon formulated plans and proceeded to put them to the test. He found a blind lad by the name of Lesuer, who was in the habit of soliciting alms at the door of one of the churches. Hauy offered to pay him from his own pocket an amount of money equal to that which he gained as a mendicant. The lad accepted and proved to be an excellent pupil. Hauy's success was so remarkable that in a short time he was invited to read a paper on the education of the blind before the Royal Academy of Science and exhibit the attainments of his pupil. The members were enthusiastic over what they heard and saw and a commission was appointed to examine more fully into the matter, with the result that an association was formed to further the education of the blind and soon twelve sightless children were placed under instruction. The school became one of the lions of Paris, and Hauy became a great favorite of Louis XVI and for a time acted as his secretary. The school increased in numbers and its success was phenomenal. Unfortunately the dark period of the revolution was now at hand and many of the school's donors were either imprisoned or guillotined. The State now took it under its care, but a bankrupt treasury could not provide very well for its needs. Hauy remained with the school all through the dark period and just as things began to brighten, an unwise step in the management of the school by the Consular Government caused Hauy to resign, and for many years after this the school was in a precarious condition. Hauy was in the meantime invited by the Czar of Russia to start a school for the blind in St. Petersburg. He accepted this invitation and presided over the school with success, until old age compelled him to resign.

In the meanwhile schools had been established in Great Britain and other portions of Europe, but in our own country nothing had yet been done. In 1829 Dr. John Fisher, of Boston, who had studied medicine in Paris, and had seen the success of the school at that place, felt that something should be done for the blind in New England. He called a meeting of the prominent men of Boston and a committee was formed which had for its object the education of the blind. This committee applied to the Legislature for an Act of Incorporation which was immediately granted, and a small fund for starting the work was provided by the Legislature in 1830. In the following year the Trustees engaged the services of Dr. Samuel G. Howe, the famous Greek patriot, and in 1831 he left for Europe to study the methods used in the principal schools for the blind there, returning in 1832 to start what is now known as the Perkins Institution for the Blind. The same year a similar institution was started in New York, and the following year the Pennsylvania Institution for the Blind came into existence. Ohio, Virginia, and Kentucky followed in rapid succession the example of the three older States. The work has now grown so that there are 50 schools for the blind in this country where the young blind are given a thorough English education, the course being similar to that of the public schools. In most of the schools there is a High School department where those who wish may have a High School course. In addition to this, an excellent musical training is given, and some occupation, profession, or trade taught that insures a livelihood for every boy and girl if given a square deal after leaving school. Last, but not least, is the physical development of the blind child. From the day he enters until the time he graduates he is given systematic physical training in the gymnasium, and on the athletic field. He is brought into competition with seeing boys and is able to give a good account of himself. He thus gains confidence, independence, and ability to do things for himself, and to appear normal in all he does. He is taught that he has his sphere in the world and that the loss of one sense does not deprive him of his manhood nor does it take away his responsibilities as a man.

It may be of interest to you, as citizens of Pennsylvania, to know that the two schools for the blind in this State, the one at Overbrook, and the other at Pittsburg, are recognized as leading the profession and in no other State in the Union have blind boys and girls as excellent an opportunity for all round development as they have in this State.

As to the future of the blind, the outlook is very hopeful. There are now associations in a large number of the States that assist in securing employment for the blind that have never attended a special school and also for those who have graduated from such schools. In this State we have the Pennsylvania Association for the Blind with headquarters at Pittsburg, which is reaching out and helping by advice and encouragement the blind throughout the State. It has since our last meeting at Williamsport started a workshop for the blind in Pittsburg, which is at present giving employment to forty-four blined persons. The money for starting the workshop was obtained from the City of Pittsburg.

Upon you rests a grave responsibility in the future of the blind of this State. In your capacity as citizens of the State and in your official capacity in the various counties from where you come, it is your duty to see that all the young blind in your districts are sent to a special school for the blind, where they will be given an opportunity to become intelligent, self-supporting citizens. If you fail to do this these unfortunate children are doomed to pass through life, ignorant, unhappy and practically useless, and in most cases they become a burden upon the taxpayers of the county. The future of these is in a measure in your hands. Again the future of the adult blind of your districts is dependent to a large extent upon you. When a person in adult life loses his sight don't feel that you have done your full duty when you admit him to the Almshouse or give his family a small sum weekly for his support. Do not doom that poor man to a life of idleness and unhappiness because he has lost his vision. Find some employment for him and make him feel that he is not altogether useless. Of course, if it is an aged person very little can be done for him, but a man or woman in the prime of life should not be consigned, as it were, to the ash heap because one sense is gone. Suppose you or I lost our sight tomorrow, would we feel that our usefulness was ended? No, decidedly not.

Some one may ask, "What can a blind man do and how can I help him?" Over a year ago a young married man in Erie, not quite thirty, lost his sight. He was too independent to beg or become a burden upon the taxpayers of his county. He wanted work. A few of the good people of Erie, together with the Pennsylvania Association for the Blind, sent him away to learn chair caning, paid his board while he was learning, and the last I heard of him he was at home contributing to the support of his family.

Another married man, a photographer, who suddenly lost his eyesight, started the dyeing of broom handles, on a small scale, and now he has a lucrative business. Another man lost his sight in a mine explosion. His friends, after consulting with the association, started him to raise chickens and he is doing well. Another young man received aid to start a news stand and he has made a comfortable living from it.

About three years ago our field officer found a young man eighteen years old in one of the Almshouses in the western part of the State. This young man was an adopted son, and when he lost his sight the family who had adopted him felt that he was only a burden upon them and placed him in the Almshouse. When he reached our school he appeared to be sixty years of age. He walked with a cane and all hope in life seemed to have left him. In one year with careful training in the gymnasium and on the athletic field he was transformed into a good looking well built young chap. All the old look had disappeared. He graduated from the Industrial Department of our school last June, and he left full of confidence that with a little financial assistance he could start a broom shop, make a comfortable living, and relieve the county of the burden of his support.

A little over a year ago a young man was sent from the country to a Philadelphia hospital in the vain hope of recovering his eyesight. He had no near relatives and he was to be sent from the hospital to the Almshouse in the county from which he came. Our field officer went to the hospital, talked with him, found him willing to work, but no prospect of employment. The field officer then went to one of the tobacco factories near where the boy formerly lived and the Superintendent promised, after some persuasion, to let him try tobaçco stripping. Within six months this boy had a heavier pay envelope than any other stripper in the factory, and all were paid by piece work.

If there is a blind man in your district or County Almshouse go back with the determination that you will give him a chance to do something useful. You can, at least, give him words of encouragement and good cheer, and bring light and happiness into his life. I cannot do better than to close this paper with a quotation from Helen Keller, that wonderful young lady who is deprived of both sight and hearing:

"There is no law in the statute books compelling people to move up closer on the bench of life to make room for a blind brother; but there is a divine law written on the hearts of men constraining them to make a place for him, not only because he is unfortunate, but also because it is his right as a human being to share God's greatest gift, the privilege of man to go forth unto his work."

J. M. Norris, Superintendent of the Boys' Industrial Home, Warrendale, Pa., here read a paper on "The Juvenile Court for the Wayward Boys." It follows:

PAPER BY MR. J. M. NORRIS.

Mr. President, Ladies, and Gentlemen.

In 1909 the Legislature of Pennsylvania passed an act to establish and maintain schools for the care and education of male children that may come under the jurisdiction of the Juvenile Court, conferring the powers and regulating the proceedings for the establishment, maintenance, and management thereof.

The act provides that this school, so established, shall be supplementary to the school system of the Commonwealth, and shall be kept open during the entire year, and shall be established on the home-cottage plan.

The act also provides that adequate provisions shall be made for playgrounds, instruction in the common branches, manual and moral training, and further provides that the school shall be established upon farms, located either within or without the limits of Allegheny County.

In pursuance of this act Allegheny County purchased 1,053 acres of land, situated 20 miles north of Pittsburg. Over one-half of this land is located in Butler County. As to the selection of this tract, it took the Board of Managers considerably over a year to finally settle upon the tract secured. This time was well spent, as the Board of Managers who selected it certainly had an inspiration. The farm lies about 1,000 feet above the level of the sea, is high and dry, and healthy, and is just hilly enough to furnish sufficient drainage. The Board of Managers visited every section in Allegheny County in search of a suitable farm, and this was the only one that came up to the high standard set, in the selection of a site. The school and the farm is managed by a Board of Directors appointed by the Judges of the court, and are all men of the highest character and intelligence. The present Board consists of the following: James R. Mellon, President; David B. Oliver, Vice President; E. Z. Smith, Secretary; T. D. Davis, James L. Stuart, I. K. Campbell, George L. Walter, R. M. Little, Charles A. Fagan, J. Denny O'Neil, A. J. Kelly, Jr., and S. J. Toole.

It has been decided to erect about thirty cottages with a capacity of twenty boys each, or a sufficient number of cottages to take care of the delinquent boys that may come through the Juvenile Court of Allegheny County. We have decided to build these cottages in three groups; an inner group located near the administration building, where the boys will be kept who have not sufficient intelligence to do the skilled work on the farm. In addition to this group and located near it there will be an industrial group, where manual training and the elementary training in such trades as carpentry, masonry, blacksmithing, tailoring, laundering, printing, perhaps telegraph operating and typewriting. In addition to this all the boys will receive a certain amount of training in the elementary principles of agriculture.

The boys will be detained in no sort of an enclosure and will be permitted to come and go about the same as if they were in no school of detention. A large number will be housed on small plots of ground, say 20 or 30 acres, where they will be a little community in themselves. They will be made responsible for the care and the keeping of horses, cows, sheep, and chickens, and for the care of the various farm stock. It is hoped that there will be a generous rivalry between the managers of the various farms that their's may be the best.

The old-fashioned institution where boys are detained as prisoners is losing public confidence and there is mistrust of institutions where boys are kept as prisoners.

It is come to be regarded that the strict and the stern discipline of the jail or the penitentiary may make excellent prisoners, but not good citizens.

Public sentiment is demanding that delinquent boys under 16 years of age who have been committed to the care of others than their own fathers and mothers, should be kept under surroundings that approach as nearly as possible the conditions of the first-class home. They are not to be thought of as criminals and are never to be referred to even as bad boys. That part of their career is to be kept dark. They are not criminals, and from my brief experience in handling them, I feel constrained to say that they are not worse than the average American boy, but are much more unfortunate.

It used to be considered, and the cases were argued in court as the Commonwealth against Willie Smith, but now the attitude of the court and the attitude of those who handle these delinquent boys is changed. It is the Commonwealth for Will Smith, and the institution not created to punish Willie Smith for misdoings, but to sympathize with, uplift and help him. The Juvenile Court is a fine example of what all courts ought to be. No court should be a court of law, but all should be courts of justice, where justice can be meeted out without so much regard to the red tape of precedent and example. Two or three years ago a confrence was called in Washington City by President Roosevelt. At this meeting the dominant note of the discussion was that a middling good home for a boy is far better than a very good institution, and that institution that is to render the greatest help to these boys is the one that is to reproduce as nearly as possible the conditions of the normal home. The boys should not be made to march in groups to and fro, continually in military squads, and to be handled in groups, but should be dealt with as individuals. Broken down homes explains why most of these boys appear before the Juvenile Court. Most of them say when you ask them—"Mother is dead," "father is dead," or "father ran away and never came back." And very frequently, "father drinks, beats and abuses mother and us children." So most of these boys that come to us have really never known what it is to have a home. One of my boys lived for months in a dog kennel. Others slep for weeks in box cars. Though these places did not afford many of the comforts of a home, yet these little fellows are deeply attached to something that to them was a home.

During the first week or two of their stay with us at the farm they have an almost uncontrollable desire to return to their old haunts. I really never knew what it was to see thoroughly homesick boys until I came here. Towards this home, little fellows, will run off in the night, with scarcely any clothing, vainly seeking after what instinct has led them to regard as a home.

I, therefore, think that before a very great success can come to our institution, or to any institution, its officers, somehow must supply that mother love and that tenderness and sympathy that is the keynote that binds together every first-class home.

Where this love and sympathy is supplied these boys respond readily and quickly and are willing to work hard to help you along in your undertakings. I would, therefore, say the thing that is most needed in the regeneration and the training of these unfortunate children is a tender sympathy, a kindly encouragement, and with it all a firm and steadfast discipline.

A second element that I think is essential in the regeneration of these boys is time in which reform may be made. Most of their little lives have been spent in homes that have been broken down and bad habits have been formed that will take time to correct. It is always wise in the doing of any great task to take time enough to do it right, and this work should not be left when the task is half completed. Two boys have been paroled from our school that I know were little better than when they came to us. All the work that had been done for their regeneration will probably have to be done over again. They will go back to the homes that had previously failed to make good with them, and the home that failed before will probably do no better the next time.

That you may have some idea of the boys that come to this school I give you the following statistics: Of 53 boys committed only three have reached the sixth grade; by far the greater number had not attained the fourth year; and a considerable number not able to read or write. Of the 53 one was 8 years old, four were 9, three ten, four 11, and nine 12, six 13, ten 14, nine 15, and five 16, making the average 12 years 11 months. Of these 53 boys there were 21 Americans, 1 Austrain, 1 Canadian, 1 Englishman, 7 Germans, 6 Italians, 3 Poles, 1 Scotchman, 9 Irish, 1 Hungarian, 1 Russian, and 1 Welshman. We have four Jews and by far the larger number Roman Catholic. You will notice the Scotch and the Welsh furnish the few. The Scotch, perhaps, because they are a bit too canny to be caught; the Irish, German, and Italian furnish the large proportion. We would gain from this that the Americans do not fail as often in the successful rearing of their boys as do the foreigners. According to the census of 1910 one-fourth of the population of Allegheny County were foreigners. According to this proportion they should have had thirteen boys here, while they have thirty-two.

By questioning the boys it is soon made apparent that nearly all their fathers are intemperate and very frequently the mothers, also. The boys are physically defective in very many respects; they are pale, aenemic, and seem poorly nourished. Their inheritance of weak bodies is the greatest barrier they have to moral, physical, and intellectual progress. I can perhaps best explain heredity by saying that all of us began existence in the form of a single cell and our heredity or inheritance depends entirely upon the quality of that single cell with which we started this life. If our ancestors were weak, emanciated and unhealthy, it then follows that the cells that went to make up their organisms, were correspondingly weak and poor in quality. These cells may be easily studied and their qualities determined by a microscopical examination. If the neucleus is large and the surrounding parts full the cell is healthy and normal. If an individual starts his life with a weakened cell, this parent cell begets all succeeding cells of the same quality and kind. It does not follow that the physical state of health may never be improved, but it does follow that a handicap of a weak parent cell that is poor in quality and low in tone, will be a handicap upon the individual as long as he lives, and to a very large extent will determine his measure of success in this life. Even the temporary condition of the cells at the time of conception, effects the whole life of the individual. It is generally conceded that the exciting cause of epilepsy is the intoxication of one or both of the parents at the time of conception. From this it will be seen that a temporary affection of the cells of the parent, causes a permanent one in the offspring.

It is of prime importance in any plan for the regeneration of unfortunate boys to first improve their physical condition. Let me illustrate how essential it is. In the Munsterburg Reform School, in a group of 200 boys considered, 161 were deficient. There were 85 cases of slight epileptic disturbances, 24 were insane, 26 cases of well established epilepsy, and 26 cases suffering from other nervous diseases. Children are especially liable to inherit any nerve weakness possessed by the parent. Is not the cause of the wrong doing of these children that they are not strong enough to successfully combat temptation, having weak bodies they have weak wills and little powers of resistance, and hence are easily led into the ways of wickedness. Ought not then the first step towards their moral regeneration be their physical improvement. That this thing might be achieved our Board of Managers held a joint meeting with the faculty of the medical, dental, and physicological departments of the University of Pittsburg, and enlisted their sympathy and co-operation, and better still their enthusiastic help, and I cannot pay too great a tribute to Chancelor McCormick for his very energetic and very thorough plans by which he made the resources of the great University of Pittsburg to articulate with the work we are to do at our school.

The medical inspection came directly under the supervision of Dr. Arbuthnot, Dean of the Department of Medicine of the university. As soon as the school was opened we sent groups of boys to the university for their medical inspection. Since the university closed in July we have not taken up the medical inspection, as the university has not been in operation very long. To illustrate how thorough and efficient this help is Samuel Livingston, one of our boys, had his arm broken one Sunday afternoon. The broken bone was set by Dr. Langham, who happened to be a visitor at the farm. The next day, however, the boy was sent to the University of Pittsburg, and two of their best men were detailed to make an examination of the broken bone; to make sure that the bones had been properly adjusted an X-ray was taken and no king's son could have had better attention than had this unfortunate boy. Too much praise cannot be given the University of Pittsburg for the help it is giving us. Since the opening of the university in September we have had squads of from eight to ten boys down to the university twice a week; here the teeth were thoroughly cleaned of all tartar, diseased gums treated and cavities filled. We were all astonished at the great improvement that is made in the appearance of the boys.

Good teeth immediately affects nutrition and I count the work the dentists are doing as by far the most valuable done by the University of Pittsburg for our boys. A boy that is building a body that is to last him for threescore and ten years should have the most efficient tools that it is possible for him to have in the construction of this body. No more can a carpenter build a good building with poor implements than can a boy build a body with poor teeth. The quality of the body as to strength, endurance, and efficiency, depends to a great extent upon the condition of the teeth. It is highly important that both the temporary and the permanent teeth be kept in the best possible condition. It is a sad mistake to neglect the child's teeth because they are the temporary ones, not realizing that the quality of the permanent teeth will depend upon the condition of the temporary ones. The most common of all diseases that affect humanity is dental caries. About 95 per cent of our people suffer from this disease, which strikes directly at nutrition and deranges that fine adjustment of the body it should have. I sent one boy, a very disagreeable fellow, indeed, to Dr. Friessell; the dentist discovered that he was suffering from three large abscesses and two exposed nerves; these he treated. About the same time the boy's housefather punished him for disobedience, the boy is now a splendid, obedient fellow and we hardly know which medicine wrought the cure.

We have touched rather lightly upon the matter of nutrition. Here is fallow ground for the regeneration of delinquent boys, most of whom have never had sufficient nutritious food.

Grown people may neglect the matter of food with less evil consequences than children, because their bodies are already built, while the child's body is just in the process of construction. You can no more get a good body from poor food than you can get a good house from poor lumber. This brings us face to face with the problem of the future treatment of these boys. I am constrained to say that it will be a better investment for the Commonwealth of Allegheny County to buy wholesome, nutritious food for these boys than to spend large amounts in building handsome and elaborate cottages in which to house them.

Boys should have a varied diet that will supply all the needs of the growing body. The food does not need to be expensive, but sufficient variety is demanded to supply all the chemical elements that go to build the organism. There are not many kinds of food. There are the Carbo-hydrates, or starches; the foods that furnish the energy for the body; they are the steam to the boiler. The fats and oils and some essential salts, and protein. These proteins are very important in the building of the body of growing boys, for they furnish the material from which all growth must come. Protein should, therefore, be furnished in abundance. Peas, beans, lentils, meat, are the foods that furnish it. Perhaps the most digestible form of protein is milk and the milk of the Holstein cow is the richest of all milks in this substance. This explains why this cow is used to supply the milk for nearly every up-to-date institution in America. We supply each boy about a quart of milk a day.

Perhaps the most important habit that a boy can acquire is the habit of industry. No boy is of much account who either cannot or does not learn to work. If his bodily machine is in good working order and is being supplied with a well balanced diet containing just the amount of protein, carbo-hydrates, fats and oils and salts that are needed to nourish his body, he will be full of energy and willing to work. More than that he will take a joy in working. Lazziness indicates that there is something wrong with his bodily machine that it does not supply him with sufficient energy, or this boy is wasting his energy in secret vices or in some way. Taking it for granted that he is well nourished, every boy rich or poor, bad or good, should be trained do some kind of useful work; nothing is better than work to strengthen and train the will, especially if this work is congenial to the boy and is done under proper leadership. No richer joy comes to a lad than that which comes when he knows he does a great thing and does it well. If a boy has someone to encourage him and help him in his work he will take a joy in the work he does. Work uses up the surplus energy of the body and prevents a boy from indulging in secret vices that sap his energy and ruin his life.

Work should be systematic and continuous and should be work that is worth while. Work that will bring a blessing to some one, such as the growing and harvesting of crops, the building of roads, etc. We make the boys to feel that the boy most to be desired by society is the one that is willing to work and to work hard. The hard worker gets great credit here. One family group of 20 boys in a day and a half picked 185 bushels of apples. We have a care all times that we do not exploit the child for his labor. Our Board of Managers is not concerned and not edified by the amount of work the boys get done, but are pleased at the thought that habits of industry are being formed. We try to give each just the amount of work that is needed to train him in habits of industry. Many of the boys who are not strong are not asked to do anything until they have accumulated a sufficient stock of strength so that they may work with some pleasure to themselves. We try never to call upon any boy to do a task that he is unable to do or to work when he is too tired. Weariness indicates that labor should cease and we try to have our boys quit work before extreme weariness comes on. Our boys rise at 6 o'clock in the morning, go to work at 7:30, are called off for rest and refreshment at 11, from 11 to 1:30 they have for play, Saturday afternoon is a half holiday. Much of their time is not taken up by any active work on the farm. All this spare time is reserved for play.

We are trying to use up this time spent in play in well organized games, where sides are chosen and competition is keen. An hour spent in competitive games where the competition is keen and excitement runs high is infinitely better than dull and listless games where there is little excitement. We have baseball, will have basketball, and perhaps tennis. It is easy to get them to play competitive games with great energy and enthusiasm. They attack the game with the energy of an army advancing to battle. These games give them the training they need for life. It makes them aggressive and progressive. Here they are learning habits that will help them to attack the real problems of life and spare them the sad fate of the mollycoddle.

Physical culture as supplied in the schools is a good thing in its way, but the physical culture a child gets in the playing of games on the playground out in the open air is the kind that God intended he should get, and the kind that brings him the richest reward in health, strength, and enthusiasm.

Teachers are most interested in what will be done for these boys in the way of educational training. These boys have wasted their years and have little time left to gain the lost ground. It would seem, therefore, the right thing to make their education as efficient as possible by eliminating everything that is not absolutely necessary; give them a good training in the fundamental principles of arithmetic, and a training in those parts of arithmetic that they will most need in their life work. In language emphasis should be put upon composition, letter writing, and business forms. All this they will need in after life. A very brief course in geography. History should be brifly taught and the biographies of great men should be carefully studied. We all should be deeply interested in the life of every great man and try if possible to learn the characteristics that enabled him to succeed; that we may know his plans and follow them. It is planned to give the boys one-half day's work on the farm during the summer, as far as possible out in the fields, and one-half day in the school. We will have school open during the entire year.

All boys will be taught how to use tools, not to make mechanics out of them, but to make men. We want them to learn how to do things for themselves. The world needs men who can decide what is to be done, who can take the initiative and who will do things in new and original ways. The manual training ought to be varied, so each lad will have opportunity to express his individuality, to formulate his ideas in the making of some project. To take the initiative and work out his plans in his own way. We believe in this training because it helps to form habits of industry. More boys go wrong through lazziness and the desire to get things without paying the price in labor for them than in any other way. Too much emphasis cannot be put upon the value of hard, intelligent, consecutive and continuous labor in the formation of a boy's character. About two years ago I visited Industry New York, near Rochester, where 600 delinquent boys cultivate a large farm. I was there in November when they were hauling in the husked corn to the graneries. These boys had planted this corn, cultivated it, cut and husked it. When I was there they were hauling home the yellow corn and their happy faces showed the triumph that comes with the bringing in of the sheaves.

Last Sunday at the Sunday School I read to our boys the part of Hiawatha telling of the legends concerning mondamin or Indian corn. It related that when the Indian maid found the blood red ear when husking she called out "Nuska, Nuska, I shall have a sweetheart." Our cornfield is situated on the site of an old Indian village. Everywhere you see signs of the departed Red Men. The stones are reddened by camp fires, Indian arrow heads, spalls of flint are picked up in great abundance. After this brief talk our boys were keen to go to the cornfield and in two days and half they cut our 25-acre field of corn. In the cutting of this corn and in the doing of the various tasks that are performed on the farm they daily solve dozens of problems that require intelligence, initiative and will power in their solution. The solution of these problems supplies valuable education to our boys and explains in a general way why farmers' sons like Abou Ben Addan lead all the rest.

A word or two about the quality of teachers that we hope to get. We hope to obtain for our school the very best teachers obtainable. No teacher is worthy to come to our farm to teach who is unwilling to give up the ordinary enjoyments of life. She must concentrate her life to the great work and take a large share of her recompense in the assurance that she is rendering to society the richest and rarest service that it is possible for any human being to give. She must expect that a large part of the compensation she will receive is the knowledge that she is helping unfortunate boys and doing a kind of work that God somewhere, somehow abundantly bless all those who concentrate their lives to so holy a task. Most of these boys are misfits in the public schools, are misunderstood, can't get along with the teacher, and are out of harmony with the social order of things. Our teacher must have a sublime faith in the possibility of such boys, must be able to gain the complete confidence of him and trust and believe in him. Women are perhaps better fitted to perform this holy task. Their motherly instincts are warm and their sympathetic natures are tender; characteristics that these boys need and crave. They long for some one who understands them and can sympathize with them. Last July we purchased 600 white leghorn chicks, one day old, that had never known the loving cluck of a mother hen; when darkness settled down the instinct to crawl under the protecting wings of a mother hen was so strong that they would all huddle up in a corner, sometimes twenty deep, and in five minutes thirty of them were smothered to death in the coop, and nearly all would have perished had they not been watched. They went down to death in a vain search for something that would take the place of a mother's protecting wing. This same instinct is strong in the boy and the teacher and the housefather and housemother and Superintendent and everybody on the farm who deals with these boys must be of those who have a strong and abiding sympathy in the welfare of boys and believes to the uttermost in their possibilities to achieve great things in this world.

Mr. Norris' paper was received with applause.

Mrs. A. P. Bowie, of Uniontown, Secretary of the Children's Aid Society of Fayette County, read the following paper on "Public Care of Children," which was received with applause:

PAPER BY MRS. A. P. BOWIE.

Mr. President, Ladies, and Gentlemen.

"The Public Care of Children" was the subject assigned to me, and I am a little uncertain how to treat it. If it means their care in orphanages and similar institutions we members of the Children's Aid Society must oppose it, except in special cases and for limited periods. Of course I am speaking only of dependent and neglected children, the delinquents are discussed by others. But if the subject refers to the care of children by societies or individuals other than parents the case is different. Of course the father and mother should be the best guardians for their children, but when they fail it is the duty of the public to look after the training of our future citizens. As you know, that is, if you know us at all, the chief object of the Children's Aid Society, not as Dr. Kelsey seems to think, the separating of children from worthy though poor parents, is to give to every childless couple a child to love and care for and to every homeless child the loving care which for any reason he failed to receive in the home into which he was born. The Psalmist says that children are "like arrows in the hand of a mighty man"—but arrows must be of good, straight material, carefully fashioned as to weight and balance if they are to hit the mark; a crooked arrow, whether the crook is in the grain of the wood or from being warped in the quiver is a very dangerous thing to the bystanders; so a child that has inherited evil tendencies must receive special attention else he becomes a menace to society—therefore some of our wards, after all attempts on our part to straighten the crook have failed, are finally placed with Dr. Murdock at Polk or Mr. Penn at Morganza. But in most cases the fault has been in the quiver and when the children are removed from bad surroundings and placed in homes under wise foster parents they grow into straight and true men and women and strike the very center of the target of success.

We feel that our Children's Aid Industrial School for Girls located here in Indiana has been most successful in this straightening process—very few, indeed, have been the girls who have failed to respond to the care and training received from our teachers and matron, under the loving supervision of the Superintendent, Mrs. Williard, that veteran of good works—many will there be at the end to rise up and call her blessed. We are really very proud of our school, which is our own from top to bottom, not a dollar of State money in it; and we want you all to give it a thorough inspection and then I am sure that when some county Children's Aid Society appeals to its Poor Directors to send one of its wards there he will say, "Yes, indeed, that's the very thing to do."

If we only had something equally as good for our boys we would be very glad, but we are too poor to do anything more. We sometimes send them to the Boys' Industrial Home at Oakdale, where Mr. Cleland does the best he can, hampered as he is by lack of means—but he can give them no training except in farm work. Allegheny County has an industrial school for Juvenile Court boys, but has probably no room for outsiders. In some of the public schools industrial training is given, but people who ought to know say that it is money wasted—that the courses are not thorough enough to accomplish anything. If this is true, why not improve them—economize in the classical and scientific courses, which young people who need them can get later, and make a thorough industrial training a part of the curriculum of every public school—graduate a lot of first-class cooks, housekeepers, carpenters, plumbers, etc., and see if in the couse of a few years some of our reform schools wouldn't have to close their doors for lack of inmates. The old saying is surely true that "Satan finds some mischief still for idle hands to do;" and when we see the crowds of boys and girls sauntering along the streets or crowding in and out of the picture shows and cheap theaters we wonder what the result will be. As I said in the beginning, the chief aim of our society is the placing of homeless children in homes, but there are other classes which appeal to us; let me speak of one case of which I know personally. The father was sent to the penitentiary, leaving five children to the care of a mother who didn't bear a very good name before and who since has become a thoroughly bad woman, on the streets night after night, possibly driven to this by poverty, but presumably not, as she receives some outdoor relief. The oldest child, a girl of 14, is said by the neighbors to be following in the foosteps of the mother. The woman resents any interference—"the children are mine and it's nobody's business how I bring them up." But is it not the business of the public? Should there not be some way to save these children from the criminal life which now seems inevitable? If not for the sake of morality, then from an economic standpoint, for looking forward a few years see what a broad stream of evil may flow from this fountain head.

Still another class there is—a mother, widowed, or worse still, deserted, is left with one, two, or half a dozen children—she doesn't want to lose them. She hopes the husband may come back, or perhaps some of the children will soon be old enough to help earn a living; but she cannot at present earn enough to pay her rent and living expenses—how shall we best help her? We feel that in most cases it is much better to put these children into good boarding homes where they will be well fed, sent to school if old enough, have manners and morals looked after, thus allowing the mother to visit and keep in touch with them and yet to go out to service and pay what she can towards their board, rather than to give her just enough outdoor relief to keep the 'wolf at the door' from getting his whole body inside the house—or forcing the mother to work so hard and so steadily that she is too weary in mind and body to look after her children and they practically "bring themselves up," and often alas! make a mighty poor job of it.

One more case and I am done—this also from personal knowledge. Some years ago a colored man was sent to the penitentiary, leaving a wife and two boys, the youngest about three years old. He wanted her to take the children and go to his mother, some place in the East, but she did not do so. Tried to get along for a time, but about four years ago had the children committed to the county and disappeared. The father finally found out where the children were (they had been placed in the care of our Children's Aid Society by the Directors) and ever since has used the one sheet of paper a month, which is all that is allowed him, in writing to ask about his children. He is so grateful for all that we have done for them and his only pleasure seems to be the prospect of soon being with them and making a home for them. He has begged that they may not know where he is, and says that he will live in the future so that his boys need not be ashamed of him.

Now, doesn't it seem poor economy that a big strong man, able and willing to work (a model prisoner, the Chaplain says), whose deprivation of liberty would seem sufficient expiation for crime committed, couldn't have supported his own children and not have the public supporting all three. Of course, we might have found homes for these little fellows, but we feel that the inspiration towards good living which the prospect of having his boys again has been to the man, has been worth all it has cost us to keep them, but the waste is there all the same, which will help us in future work. We lay our problems before you hoping for suggestions. We greatly appreciate the way in which this Association has always treated the Children's Aid Society and we are sorry that more of our county societies are not represented here, for those of us who have attended the meetings year after year find them increasingly interesting and instructive.

Prof. J. W. Cleland, of Oakdale, Pa., Superintendent of the Boys' Industrial School, here addressed the convention on "The Boy Problem." He said:

ADDRESS OF PROF. CLELAND.

I have been too busy to prepare a paper. The problem of the boy is too big a subject for me to settle in the time allotted to me, or for any one to settle in any length of time. I was brought up in a large family of boys. There were seven of us, and we were not brought up in the best environments, either. We grew up in the world, and I may say that not one of them ever used liquor or tobacco, and I don't know that any of them were ever inside of a theater until they were grown up. I was never in a traveling circus; I guess I was too busy. I think most of us made a success in life. And the reason, I believe, was that we had good, sensible, Christian parents; I think that is the solution of the boy problem—and the girl problem, too.

I have a letter here which reads:

"Dear Sir: I have two boys, aged five years, which I wish to place in your home, as I am unable to manage them. They simply are beyond my control."

Isn't that a wonderful confession for a mother. I wrote back that they were too young for us, and that I thought she ought to control them. I get all out of patience with people wanting to turn their incorrigible children on to us for us to train them.

I will tell you something of our work. I became interested in the work in the City of Chicago. My attention was called to the necessity for the work in this State, through a visit to the Morganza Reform School. The Superintendent had the boys coralled in the schoolroom and he pointed to several boys and said, "Those boys haven't any business here." I asked him why, and why they were there, and he said, "Don't you know there is no place in the State where they can be sent, except around Philadelphia, and for that reason they are committed to us as orphan and homeless boys, and are obliged to serve out a sentence."

I commenced to think about it and told a number of people of what I saw at Morganza, and told them we needed an Industrial School for boys. That the Catholics had them, but the Protestants did not. I went to see the President of our Board, and a number of prominent men got together and we organized the Boys' Industrial Home. That soon filled up, and this place at Oakdale was offered us and we didn't have a cent to pay for it, but we trusted to getting the money, and I went after it and we soon got it. We paid for the property in three or four weeks; then we thought we needed some land and we bought 160 acres a mile away, and soon paid for that. Then we enlarged the Oakdale property and paid for that, and then we bought 260 acres from the Oakdale Coal Company and paid for that.

So we now have 365 acres of land, all out of debt and a valuable property at Oakdale, and we are caring for homeless and neglected boys.

We had in the Home October 1, 1910, 144. We received through the Juvenile Court of Allegheny, 37; through the Juvenile Courts of other counties, 21; from friends, 18; church and charity workers, 24, making a total of 244 handled during the year, as follows: Methodist Episcopal, 54; Presbyterian, 34; Catholic, 29; Lutheran, 27; Jewish, 13; Baptist, 9; Episcopal, 9; United Presbyterian, 9; United Brethren, 6; other denominations, 21; no denomination, 33; total, 244.

I asked one boy what his religion was and he didn't seem to know. I asked whether Protestant or Catholic and he didn't know that. I said where do your folks go to church and he said, "We never go anywhere; we are Democrats." (Laughter).

We have the larger boys out on the farm, and the smaller boys we keep at Oakdale. The larger boys are all Juvenile Court boys. (I think we never had any from Indiana County). The father of some of the boys is dead, and the mothers of some are dead, and in some cases both the father and mother are dead, and in many cases they are both living—and in many such cases the boy is as friendless and homeless as though they were both dead. Many times we can do better for boys where they are wholly orphan.

Mrs. Bowie spoke of industrial training. I will say that we have that. We have farm work, and at present we are preparing for a shop on the farm. Our manual training teacher was taken away from us through sickness.

I believe I can say, as Prof. Norris said, that our boys are turning out quite well. We have cared for 1,210 boys in the time we have been running, in the eleven years, but we have never had a death in the family.

Our expenses last year were $27,000 for running expenses and for permanent improvements between $7,000 and $8,000.

In the handling of the 244 boys in the last twelve months our bill for drugs and medicines wasn't more than $22 or $23. Not more than many small families spend; so it looks as though the boys were well fed and cared for.

I might says this, in closing: We have taken nearly 300 boys from the Juvenile Courts, but we decided it would be better to continue the line of work we first mapped out and not make it a reformatory or a home so much for delinquents as for dependents and neglected children; so we were very glad that Allegheny County established their own Home. It will relieve us very largely of the worst class. I hope they will send them all to Prof. Norris. He has broad shoulders and I think he can handle them. It will give us room to handle more of the neglected and dependent children.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. Mackin submitted the following report of the Committee on Resolutions. Upon motion, the report was adopted:

The Committee on Resolutions respectfully submits the following:

We desire to express our hearty appreciation to the good people of Indiana for their very cordial welcome and hospitable entertainment.

Our sincere thanks are also due to the Indiana State Normal Orchestra and Girls' Glee Club and Prof. J. R. King, who so delightfully entertained us with music.

We are thankful for the publicity which the press has given to our proceedings.

That our thanks be extended to the Commissioners of Indiana County for the use of the courthouse for our meeting.

We recommend that at the next session of the Legislature we endeavor to have some action taken that will bring about a codification and revision of the poor laws of the State.

That a special committee of three be appointed by the chair for the purpose of preparing an act of Assembly to regulate desertion and non-support and submit the same for adoption at our next convention.

That we, as members of the Association of the Directors of the Poor and Charities of Pennsylvania, most urgently recommend that the Conference of Charities and Corrections Convention be invited to join with us in our next annual meeting, and that each association preserve its individality.

We recommend that in order to make the moneys appropriated by the State to our charities have the greatest possible purchasing power, that a law be enacted requiring all organizations and institutions receiving State aid to show that in the conduct of their affairs there has been no waste and improvidence in the methods of purchasing supplies before they shall be entitled to a subsequent installment of such appropriated moneys.

We are especially pleased to record our thanks to Prof. James E. Ament and his co-workers of the Indiana State Normal School for their courtesy in showing us their most excellent institution and entertaining us in their beautiful dining room; also to the Hon. John P. Elkin and Mrs. Elkin for their kind invitation to the members and their friends to attend a reception at their palatial home.

Balance in hands of Treasurer, October 10, 1911	$ 52.04

We, the undersigned committee, appointed to audit the account of the Treasurer for the year ending October 9, 1911, respectfully report that we have performed that duty and find the same to be correct and true as stated. Balance in Treasurer's hands at last meeting, $244.62; that the Treasurer has collected during the year the sum of $605, making a total received by the Treasurer of $849.62; that the Treasurer has expended and paid out as per his receipts the sum of $797.58; leaving a balance in the hands of the Treasurer of $52.04.

The expenses of the association have been larger this year than many former years owing to the effort to secure certain legislation which was recommended by the Association, but we can congratulate ourselves on the good financial standing of the Association. Thanks are due to the Treasurer for his financiering the Association so well.

We further recommend that the same assessments be levied as were levied the past year.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

H. F. YOST,
J. A. GRAY,
CHARLES S. SNYDER,
Auditing Committee.

President Ochse read the report of the Committee on Officers for the year 1912, as follows:

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON OFFICERS.

To the President, Officers, and Members of the Association:

Your Committee on Officers for 1912 would recommend the following as officers for the next year:

For President—The Hon. H. Frank Eshelman, Lancaster.

First Vice President—Vance McCormick, Harrisburg.

Vice Presidents—George W. Beemer, Lackawanna; Mr. I. N. Dixon, Westmoreland; Mrs. E. G. Lindsey, Warren; Dr. Martin W. Barr, Elwyn; Mrs. Emma Speer, Washington; Allen Burns, Pittsburg; John McDowell, Montgomery; Bromley Wharton, Secretary State Board of Charities; Mrs. Lydia Walton, Chester; Mrs. J. H. Evans, Oil City; Dr. Carl Kelsey, Philadelphia.

Secretary and Treasurer—L. C. Colborn, Esq., Somerset.

Honorary Secretary—Hon. E. P. Gould, Erie.

Assistant Secretary—P. H. Bridenbaugh, Hollidaysburg.

Respectfully submitted,

FREDERICK FULLER,
Chairman Committee.

October 11, 1911.

Upon motion of E. D. Solenberger, of Philadelphia, the report of the Committee on Officers was adopted as read.

The convention here adjourned until 2 p. m. at this hall, the delegates to meet at a quarter before 2, at the Presbyterian Church, for a picture.

AFTERNOON SESSION, OCTOBER 11, 1911.

The convention was called to order, as per adjournment, at 2 p. m. by President Ochse, Mrs. Mary E. Bowie, of Uniontown, taking the chair.

Dr. Martin P. Barr, Superintendent of the Feeble-Minded Institute at Elwyn, read the following very interesting and instructive paper, which was received with applause:

PAPER BY DR. MARTIN P. BARR.

Marriage—Results and Effects of Heredity, Consanguinity and Environment.

Marriage, in its highest conception, has two prototypes. That of the Garden of Eden, where is found the blending of two natures into a perfection best fitted to maintain and carry forward the purposes of the Eternal Good; and later that of the Divine with humanity to redeem the great family over which evil had triumphed, and to send forth laborers to tend and dress the fair Garden of Life.

Throughout the ages in many lands many happy homes attest the recognition of these high ideals as their one foundation.

With peasantry, yeomanry and burghers, gentry and nobles alike may be traced, however adverse the times, the one idea for the defence from evil and the maintenance of good conceptions within the home and naturally, the community life. Love being the fulfilling of the Law, he who loves God must love his fellow man.

Crime and vice might be rampant, but ever the surest protest against evil and safe-guarding from ill was found in the simple home life alike of poor and rich; and that community esteemed most fortunate, that Government most stable, where such homes abounded.

Each of you doubtless can recall more than one of such, where parents truly one in association of similar tastes, sentiments and beliefs, find the truest enjoyment of life in a cheerful discharge of its duties and obligations to children and to neighbors.

As good comrades and associates in the office of guides and leaders, these heads maintain a dignity and authority commanding respect for themselves and self-respect in those for whom they are responsible; creating an atmosphere of cheerful industry, of quiet refinement, cordiality and good-will which cannot fail to prove favorable to a healthful procreation and development of children thus foreordained to emulate such examples. To such the home-building is paramount, money-getting and amusement a secondary consideration, and in communities where such homes are the rule, divorce is not practiced nor even accepted as a subject of conversation. But again there are others, you must acknowledge and, that with the new age, creeps in the all-dominating ill, demanding, if not expulsion or flood to change the current, certainly a reincarnation of good, and the hand of law to arrest and forbid.

Marriage has fallen from its high estate of a union only of congenial mates for the furtherance of the Eternal Good, and is dominated by any and every motive, sordid or unclean, sentimental or evanescent. The selfish securing of ease, money, position, or mere emotional indulgence is the motive of many in selection, while excessive excitation in the eager pursuit of either business or diversion has produced in these a neurotic condition not favorable to the production of healthy off-spring. Absorbed in the mazes of finance, of fashion, or of ignoble pursuits, married not mated, these fail to maintain a true nobility of character or position, as heads of families. The home missing the dignity of true social life with freedom under law, becomes the abiding places of tyranny or license; the children too often left lonely or neglected, or else consigned to the care of subordinates, or to the over stimulation of the school.

From either condition, naturally, the undeveloped, too often misunderstood, youth seeks escape, either in the excitement of the street or in ill-assorted unions which but emulate what they have known, with a further evolution of degeneracy, the natural result of such heredity and environment.

One may think my pictures of the day overdrawn, but, while opinions may differ, facts do not lie. For verification I need but call attention to the deserted farms, the overcrowded cities, the establishment of Juvenile Courts—a thing unknown in the past; to the startling increase in the estimated numbers of defectives, and of degenerates on many lines, and to the estimated number of divorces within 20 years, attaining the million mark.

That heredity must prove a blessing or a blight cannot be too strongly insisted upon; nor can there be greater incentive to the cultivation of perfection—moral, mental, and physical—than the assurance of the power of procreation and certain transmission of noble qualities, attained through persistent self-control. Race culture, once the dominant thought, defect and disease will find natural sequestration, and need no law to forbid participation of such in marital relations.

In many degenerate cases the sexual emotions are exaggerated, passion taking the place of that pure sentiment of which they are incapable; indeed, many fairly normal but backward are unable to discriminate between lust and love, nor can they realize that a moment of passion may jeopardize the welfare of hundreds of homes. Ignorance is responsible for much, and, unfortunately, those who should teach continue to speak with bated breath instead of exercising the truest wisdom and refinement in advising young men and young women, as a charity worker once urged upon me, "in language that he who runs might read," of the dangers of the social evil, of venereal disease and safeguarding the innocent by advice and warning. Sexual matters should be discussed with discretion surely, but as intelligently as any other subjects relating to race or communal welfare.

The effect upon the world at large of the rapid increase of degeneracy is fast becoming evident. For as soon as that stage is reached where there is a preponderance of diminished vigor of any sort, be it mental or moral or physical, that community or society is surely doomed. Then, if ever, has it need to claim the protection of law, and this is verified by the history of the past. Certainly Noah and the Ark is a good object lesson to the student of eugenics.

In marriage, as in the breeding of stock, care should be taken in selection, and great care. We are all cognizant of marriages which never should have been. The forbears may not be actually defective, but if there is neuropathic or otherwise diseased stock, imbecility, either mental or moral, or both, is sure to follow in one generation or another; and, acknowledging that we owe something to unborn generations, no one can question the advisability of restricting marriage or preventing propagation by such. Slowly the public is awakening to the call of urgent needs, and the movement is already made in some States which have instituted legal restrictions. But they do not yet go deep enough into cause and effect, and, either not recognizing or not accepting the certainty of imbecilic transmission, there is as yet no concerted action restricting the marriage of epileptics, imbeciles, and insane.

Not only does a Commonwealth fail to forbid, but it practically encourages such cohabitation, for just so long as it raises the burden from incapable shoulders and is willing to feed, clothe, and house the offspring of degenerates, just so long will there be a steady increase of its defective population. Furthermore, it provides not only support but training for these—a training that if it is to accomplish anything in self-support often so effectually conceals defect that recognition of it by the casual observer is impossible, and marriage or enslavery by the vicious and consequent reproduction is too often the natural sequence. And so the work goes on, placing literally a premium on retrogression by freeing the ignorant and indolent from the consequence of folly.

To this a halt must sooner or later be called, and in appealing to workers for the common weal one cannot urge too strongly such united action regarding this matter which ultimately may forbid the marriage or the cohabitation of the unfit.

First, by the separation, asexualization, and sequestration of recognized defectives; second, by the requirement of a certificate from parties seeking marriage license, showing a clean bill of health for at least a generation back, as a matter of simple justice to the coming generation. It is a poor rule that does not work both ways, and those ancestor worshippers so eager to vaunt the excellencies of their forbears should be impelled to such legislation preserving purity of the race by a mere sense of noblesse oblige.

The generally accepted belief that consanguineous marriages are attended with disastrous results—mental and physical—to offspring is founded upon an entire misconception of cause and effect; a misconception surely not aided by the observation of the union of bodies, organic and inorganic. Here experience dictates alike to the simple and to the scientific; alike in the arts and crafts, as in the experiments of the laboratory, that the union of strength with strength gives added power, as does a commingling of strength with finer, more delicate material the proportionate modification sought; a fact with which all stock breeders are familiar.

The natural inference, therefore, would be that if the life of a race or a family be simple and strong, free from nervous excesses and consequent excitations, the intermingling of its members would conduce to progress rather than to deterioration.

Examples are not wanting in proof of this. Witness the Jews, where intermarriage was for years the rule rather than the exception; and, while certain characteristics are accentuated, degeneracy up to this day is the exception rather than the rule.

A study of conditions in the Commune of Batz, a peninsula of the Loire Inferieure, France, shows a community of some 3,000 inhabitants leading clean, simple lives, among whom crime and intemperance are unknown. For many generations they have intermarried, yet no cases of degeneration—mental, moral, or physical—have occurred, and the number of children is above the average.

A slight taint may by a suitable marriage be diminished, and with further admixture of pure stock be finally eradicated. Although the offspring may appear to resemble one parent, it is in reality a mixture of both; and this is one of Nature's means for bringing about modifications of the race.

Indeed, Langdon Down goes so far as to say, "I am by no means sure that by the judicious selection of cousins, the race might not be improved."

A judicious selection! Ay, there is the crux of the whole matter. Let us but exercise the same care in the selection and mating of human beings that we do with beast and fowl, and degeneracy and crime not only might fast disappear from our midst, but strength and beauty—physical, mental, and moral—might have opportunity to surpass all preconceived ideals.

It cannot be denied that the offspring of consanguineous marriages have been found defective, but where the blood is pure and uncontaminated, this is the exception and not the rule. Students of the subject agree that such connections are not harmful unless there be distinct neurosis in the families, when intermarriage will but quadruple and intensify a fateful heredity.

Howe, in his investigations, notes 44 idiots, the result of 17 consanguineous marriages; but the parents were intemperate and scrofulous, each constituting a cause in itself.

Beach and Shuttleworth, who have studied the cause of mental defect in 2,380 cases, find consanguinity accountable for only 4.20 per cent; Down, in 2,000 cases, seven per cent, and my own study of 4,050 cases but 1.21 per cent, and in the majority of these there was bad heredity.

I know of one instance where for seven generations, covering a period of over 100 years, a family has married and intermarried, over 80 idiots and imbeciles being the result; but this also proves only a concentration of neurosis, as disease was rampant in the family.

A short time since I was called in consultation to give an opinion regarding the marriage of two members of a cadet branch of a noble English family, who, first cousins, resembled each other in every respect—coloring, hair, eyes, disposition, temperament, and tastes. Unhesitatingly, I advised against it; the family history showing a pronounced neurosis which, undefended by the intermixture of purer blood, would most likely reappear in a later generation.

Like should never mate with like unless there be strongly counterbalancing qualities.

Bemiss, in an exhaustive study of 833 consanguineous marriages, finds 3,943 children. Of these, 1,034 were defective—308 idiots, 145 deaf and dumb, 300 scrofulous, 85 blind, 38 insane, 60 epileptic, and 98 deformed, while 883 died in early infancy.

These statistics appear appalling at first view of what an intensified current may achieve in carrying forward defect, latent thought it may be for generations; but, although interesting, the statement does not prove a malign law in consanguinity alone, since it goes on to show that the majority were the offspring of either intemperance, defect, disease, or gross immorality.

A consideration of data and argument on both sides finds as a truism that a baneful heredity is the source of ill, while consanguinity is but heredity intensified. Hence there appears a consensus of opinion, which my own personal observations confirm, that consanguinity is simply a question of morbid heredity, and in few cases is responsible for defect per se.

Environment as effecting marriage and its resulting offspring should be considered first in its possible influence upon mothers during the period of gestation. To this condition I, in a study of some 4,050 cases, attribute 352 or 8.69 per cent. Again poverty, loneliness, overfatigue, worry, and lack of excitement on the one hand, as excess, unrest, and over-stimulation on the other would induce a condition of malnutrition, apathy, or nerve tension conducive, among those with no inherent stamina or resistance, to either defect or insanity.

While records of extrinsic or environmental influences in the actual production of defect, such as that of the Wild Boy of Aveyron and Casper Houser, are rare, there can be no doubt that the many adverse factors—improper feeding, malnutrition, overcrowding or isolation, poor ventilation, ill-treatment, over-excitement, or general neglect—must undoubtedly hinder the awakening of mental and moral faculties, while contributing largely to the development of any latent inherited neurosis.

Contrarywise, a favorable environment is esteemed indispensable to the awakening of dulled faculties, and it is to this that Guggenbuhl ascribes much of the success of the Abendberg.

Certain races, not always the most intellectual—indeed, some uncivilized there are, in both past and present, who, regarding environment of great importance, surround their women anticipating motherhood with all that is most beautiful, believing, and truly, that such natural impressions cannot fail to influence the child.

May not we then, who claim the highest intellectual status, follow where these lead, and, using heredity, consanguinity, and environment as aids, not foes, to a noble end, come at last to regard marriage as a means of securing and maintaining true race ideals?

Miss McLaughlin here extended to the ladies of the convention an invitation to visit the Public Libary of Indiana.

Dr. Frank Woodbury, of Philadelphia, Secretary of the Committee on Lunacy, read the following interesting paper, which was received with applause:

PAPER BY DR. FRANK WOODBURY.

"County Care of the Insane Under Present Law—Observation and the Results."

The problem of public provision for the insane in Pennsylvania is not a new one. A full century before the Revolution we find recorded in the archives of the Delaware County Court this concise but effective petition:

"Proceedings of Upland Court, Delaware County, A. D. 1676.

"Jan Cornelissen, of Amesland, complayning to ye Court that his son Erick is bereft of his natural senses and is turned quyt madd and yt; he being a poore man is not able to maintaine him.

"Order that three or four persons be hired to build a little block house at Amesland for to put in ye said madd man, and at the next Court, order will be taken yt; a small levy be laid for to pay for ye building of ye house and ye maintaining of ye said madd man according to the laws of ye Government."

Please notice that this first hospital for the insane on record in Pennsylvania was erected by order of a County Court, and the expense of its erection and entire cost of maintenance of this indigent lunatic was placed upon the local poor authorities. The first public hospital for the indigent insane in Pennsylvania, therefore, was a county care institution. In the course of time similar hospitals sprang up as demand was created for them in a number of couties and poor districts of the State. At the beginning they were entirely custodial in their character, and naturally, but as it turned out unfortunately for the inmates, the accommodations for the insane were of the same class as for the usual almshouse population, and in fact the insane patients in these County Hospitals, or more properly asylums, were closely associated with the poor and were generally confined in certain rooms or cells in the poorhouse.

In 1752, the Pennsylvania Hospital opened its doors to the insane and inaugurated in this State the system of treating insanity as a disease, a reform which had been already introduced in France and England. Not much improvement, however, in the treatment of the poor insane in the almshouses throughout the State was made until nearly a century later, when Miss Dorothea L. Dix, of New York, aroused public opinion by her historic memorial, which she submitted to the State Legislature of Pennsylvania on February 3, 1845. In this appeal for better treatment of the indigent insane, Miss Dix exposed many evidences of neglect and inhumanity, which she personally observed in her self-imposed task of visiting the poorhouses and jails of Pennsylvania.

It is true that the Legislature had previously heard appeals on behalf of the pauper and indigent insane, and a committee of the House of Representatives, of which Mr. Konigmacher, of Ephrata, was Chairman, was appointed to report on the subject. This report can be found in the proceedings of the House of Representatives for March 11, 1839. The bill introduced by this committee, however, failed to become a law, and it was not until the session of 1841, that a commission was appointed and a small appropriation made to purchase ground for the erection of an institution to be known as the Pennsylvania State Lunatic Hospital, which was at first intended to be located at Philadelphia, but was subsequently erected at Harrisburg. Very little was done, however, towards carrying out this much needed improvement, until after the appearance of Miss Dix before the Legislature with her heart stirring appeal, in February, 1845. In response thereto, a committee was appointed to confer with Miss Dix. Col. Alexander J. McClure, who I believe was Chairman of that committee, became an enthusiastic advocate of the measures proposed by Miss Dix, and as a result, a bill was introduced soon afterward, which appointed a commission to purchase land at Harrisburg and erect buildings for the Pennsylvania State Lunatic Hospital and Union Asylum for the Insane, and the same act authorized the Governor to appoint Trustees for the new institution. (1845 P. L., p. 440). The first patients were received October 1, 1851.

It is to be noted that in this act creating the first State hospital there is a clause which gives to the counties and local poor boards the right to have their insane patients admitted by Court order, "and the expenses of said persons if in indigent circumstances shall be paid by the county to which he or she may belong by residence." By a subsequent act (P. L. 1854, p. 85) the county is made chargeable for maintenance and other expenses of patients so committed, who have no legal residence in the poor district, as well as all other insane paupers that they may deem proper subjects for removal to the asylum. Similar provisions were introduced into the acts which organize the other State hospital for the insane erected since 1851.

I have mentioned these historical details in order to establish my first point, which is that the local poor districts are primarily, and under the law, responsible for the proper care of their indigent insane. And this was the practice in Pennsylvania for more than two hundred years. The passage of time and increasing experience, however, demonstrated that the county authorities had not successfully solved this problem. There are many reasons why this should be so. The advancement of medical science and psychiatry, for one thing showed that many cases of insanity were amenable to proper hospital treatment, and therefore, for this class of patients merely custodial care was insufficient and reprehensible. In the second instance, the standard of care in the almshouses was entirely too low and verged on inhumanity and cruelty. Finally, the task was constantly increasing, until the burden became too great for the local authorities to cope with.

The Committee on Lunacy, soon after its organization in 1883, set to work to alleviate the condition of the indigent insane by transferring many of them to the State hospitals, and to improve the condition of those remaining in the local institutions. It was found, however, that the increased cost of maintaining the indigent insane under the new requirements was proving to be too great a burden for the poor districts to bear. Two ways only presented themselves of meeting this emergency. The first was for the State to assume the entire burden of caring for the indigent insane, and care for all of them in State hospitals, as is done in New York State, or for the State to come to the financial assistance of the counties and encourage them to erect comparatively small local hospitals, so that patients could be kept in their own neighborhood, where they could be under the supervisian of their friends and relatives. The latter method was adopted in Wisconsin about twenty-five years ago, and has given satisfactory results.

The Board of Public Charities and its Committee on Lunacy approved the adoption of the so-called county care system, and succeeded in 1895 and 1897 in having laws passed by our Legislature to introduce this State-aided and State-supervised method of caring for the insane in local hospitals erected by the counties or poor districts.

Please notice the change recently made in the conditions: Formerly, when the pauper insane were placed in the State hospitals, the entire cost was charged to the counties. Under the existing arrangements for those so transferred, the counties now only pay $1.75 per week to the State hospitals, the State making up the deficit of $2 per week or more; and the State pays the counties $2 per week toward the maintenance of the indigent insane in the local hospitals for the insane, which have accepted the provisions of the so-called county care acts, which were re-enacted in 1909.

In a former communication to this organization, I reviewed the advantages of the County Care acts, and need not repeat them here. I will merely say that when the system which places the working insane on farms in practically self-supporting colonies is compared with the plan which maintains five or six thousand patients in large State hospitals, the balance is immensely in favor of the former method. This is true from the medical standpoint because modern authorities are agreed that hospitals for the insane should not be larger than 1,500 or 1,800 beds for efficient and successful management. From an economic standpoint, also, it has been shown that large hospitals are more extravagant, the per capita cost of maintenance increasing as we get above 1,500 to 1,800 beds.

In conclusion, I will acknowledge frankly that we have not followed the Wisconsin plan as closely as we might have done if there had been more time to study it and apply it. The urgency was so great, owing to the overcrowding in the existing hospitals, that the Committee on Lunacy found that it could not enforce its requirements too rigidly. In consequence, a few licenses were granted to some county hospitals, which were not as well equipped and organized as an ideal application of the method would demand. But there can be no question that the standard of treatment of the insane in local institutions throughout the State has been decidedly advanced, since the County Care acts first went into operation fourteen years ago. There are more than 6,000 indigent insane in Pennsylvania now provided for in county hospitals for the insane under the supervision of the Committee on Lunacy, and it is not too much to say that nowhere in the world are a similar number of the same class of dependent insane better housed, better clad, or better treated than these indigent insane in county hospitals for the insane in Pennsylvania, under the provisions of the present County Care acts.

Discussion was asked for on this paper.

Mr. J. C. Stewart: I was very much interested in this paper. Having already addressed this convention on two previous occasions on the question of county care of the insane, it is like threshing old straw to discuss this paper that has been so ably handled by Dr. Woodbury.

There is one proposition from which there is hardly any dissenting opinion, and that is that the indigent insane must have care; but how and where they should be cared for is a question. We have at the present time two systems, the State and the county care. The Act of 1897 which gave the Poor Boards the privilege of caring for their own insane in local institutions did not limit the class or classes for which they could make provision, but states that proper care and treatment should be provided. The real intent of that act was the care of the chronic cases. It was expected that the acute cases would be sent to the State hospitals, but many of our institutions have gone beyond the original intent of the act and are caring for the acute cases, in a manner that in many cases measures up to the care in the State institutions.

In the county care of the insane touched upon by Dr. Woodbury we have the advantage of the parol of the chronic cases and of the cases that have recovered—giving them the advantage of the home surroundings. This we do not have in the State institutions. Closer tab can be kept on them in the small institutions. And the return of the patients, if necessary to return them to the institutions, can be done in an easier manner and with greater safety to the patients.

It has been argued from time to time as to the expense of the treatment of the insane in our county and State institutions. When we consider the care of the chronic cases, they can unquestionably be cared for in the county institutions at a less cost than in the State institutions. But those institutions that are going to care for their acute cases must of necessity have a better-equipped force; in fact it must be a hospital in itself.

The acute cases must have hospital treatment, and that can only be had by the proper equipment and a sufficient nursing force. The public do not look upon the treatment of the insane from a parsimonious point of view. If we do not have sufficient funds for the proper care of the acute cases, to my mind we will retrograde to the position in which the insane were a hundred years ago. (Applause.)

Dr. A. J. Somer, Superintendent Blair County Hospital: I don't know that I can say much on this subject. I would like to say something as to the mistake made in Pennsylvania in hitching your county hospitals on to your poor farm. The poor farm has been bought only large enough for your poorhouse, and you try to put up an extensive hospital alongside of the poorhouse; they never mix, and never can mix, as long as men are bult as they are, mentally and physically. Financially it is a mistake. A county hospital ought, under the present law, to return money to that County Treasury, but as they are run in most of the counties they do not. I will admit they save money, in the long run.

I will outline our county hospital, where I have been for three years. We have to pay the market rate for milk and such things. Most county officials forget that probably 35 per cent of the people who bring patients to such an institution can afford to pay some money toward their support. But for various reasons a large number of such slip in without paying a cent. Many who are able to pay argue that because they are taxpayers they should bring their afflicted ones into the institution without cost to themselves.

Last year Blair Hospital took in about $10,000 from the class that could pay towards the patients' support. If it had not have been for that we would have been short about $8,000. But as it was we showed a profit of $2,600 for the year's work. The money that was expended and earned in that year, we had to write off the item of $8,400 of extra cash that we had to charge to 1909 and 1911.

I see no reason why the county hospitals should not get upon a higher plane than they are. There is no reason why the counties should not buy a farm some other place and put up their hospitals there.

Mrs. Sue Williard came forward and extended an invitation to the men delegates to visit the Girls' Industrial School in Indiana at 4 o'clock this afternoon.

The Committee on Place of Meeting of the Association for next year here reported that they were unable to agree upon a place. Some friendly argument occurred, after which Mr. L. C. Colborn moved that the convention go to Erie for the next meeting.

The motion of Mr. Colborn was carried by a rising vote.

ADDRESS OF DR. B. A. BLACK.

"Feeble-Mindedness and Idiocy."

In the absence of Dr. J. M. Murdoch, who was on the program for a paper on the above subject, Dr. B. A. Black, of Polk, addressed the convention as follows:

Mr. President, Ladies, and Gentlemen.

The terms idiocy, imbecility, and feeble-mindedness are all generically used to cover the whole range of arrested mental development. More specifically each term applies to a particular class.

Dr. Kelsey, in the couse of his address last evening, clearly outlined the classification which has been at least tentatively adopted in this country, so I wish to quote the English classification, as formulated by the Royal Commission on the Care and Control of the Feeble-Minded, in which the idiot is defined as "A person so defective in mind from birth, or from an early age, that he is unable to guard himself against common physical dangers."

The imbecile is defined as "One who, by reason of mental defect, existing from birth or from an early age, is incapable of earning his living, but is capable of guarding himself against common physical dangers."

Feeble-mindedness, in the mildest degree of mental defect, and the feeble-minded person is "One who is capable of earning a living under favorable circumstances, but is incapable, from mental defect existing from birth, or from an early age, (1) of competing on equal terms with his normal fellows, or (2) of managing himself or his affairs with ordinary prudence." This group corresponds to the moron, referred to by Dr. Kelsey.

In addition to this we have the moral imbecile, or one who displays from an early age, and in spite of careful upbringing, strong vicious and criminal propensities, on which punishment has little or no deterrent effect.

There is no sharp and distinct line of separation between these groups. The lower members of the class closely approach the imbecile; the higher members, on the other hand, are but little removed from the merely dull and backward of the normal population.

No general description can be given which would be applicable to every mentally defective child. A small percentage of these children would pass muster as normal if the diagnosis rested upon inspection alone. These, however, are the exception. The majority present numerous anomalies of bodily structure—the so called stigmata of degeneration—as well as of mental development.

Among the common anomalies are irregularities in the size and shape of the cranium and palate, malformations of the external ear and the eye and its appendages, and various deformities of body and limb. Inquiry will frequently show that there has been a marked delay in dentition, walking and talking. Marked irregularities in the appearance of the teeth are quite common, and often the child will not speak a word until five or six years of age.

Without going into detail I wish to speak briefly of some of the principal causes. It is agreed by all who have studied this question that morbid heredity is one of the most frequent causes of mental defect, and the commonest form of morbid heredity is disease or defect of the nervous system; as insanity, epilepsy or feeble mindedness.

Alcoholism is the hereditary factor next in importance, and the history of a large percentage of these cases shows alcoholic excesses in one or both parents. There can be little doubt that the long continued excessive use of alcohol has a deleterious effect upon the germ and sperm cell, which results in impairment of the nervous system of the offspring. There is also another mode of action to be considered, and that is the direct effect of alcohol upon the embryo. When alcohol is taken into the stomach some of it is speedily absorbed into the blood; and, therefore, alcohol taken during pregnancy very soon comes in contact with the tissues of the embryo. It has been shown by numerous experiments that alcohol exerts a marked baneful influence upon growing protoplasm; and, consequently, the excessive use of alcohol during gestation is liable to be followed by decidedly injurious consequences to the offspring. In this connection the experiments of Fere of injecting a few drops of alcoholic solution beneath the shell of embryo chicks, or subjecting incubating eggs to alcoholic vapors are of interest. By these means he was able to produce a great variety of monstrosities, or chicks of the idiotic and imbecile type.

Chronic exhausting disease, as tuberculosis, seems to have at least an indirect and contributory influence, as attested by the number of feeble-minded who come of tuberculous stock, and also by the large percentage of deaths among this class from tuberculosis.

The advanced age of the parents, consanguinity—the marriage of near relatives—and syphilis are all causes to be considered, but in the fifteen hundred cases which I myself have examined I have found the percentage attributable to these causes to be very small.

An abnormal condition of the mother during pregnancy, as worry, sudden shock or fright, or general ill health which reduces her vitality and interferes with the proper nourishment of the child in utero may result in its imperfect mental development. Although in many such cases a morbid heredity may be the real underlying cause.

During birth, a long difficult labor causing pressure, and especially if attended with asphyxia, is certainly responsible for many of the gross brain lesions, with their resulting paralyses and convulsions. With regard to instrumental delivery, which is frequently given as a cause, I do not believe the proper use of the forceps when indicated is attended with as much harm as the prolonged pressure and asphyxia resulting from a natural delivery in very difficult cases.

Injuies to the head after birth, as from a fall, is given by many people as the cause of their child's condition. If the injury is a severe one, such as to cause unconsciousness or the rupture of some of the cerebral or meningeal vessels, leading to the destruction of a local area in the brain, it indeed is a cause; but such cases are of rather infrequent occurrence; and how many normal children are there who have not had a number of falls of some kind before they see many years of life. However, the parents will often find more comfort in attributing the child's condition to an injury than to any hereditary mental taint.

In the acute diseases of childhood, as scarlet fever, measles or whooping cough, either through an accompanying meningitis, or from the severity of the toxaemia acting as a direct poison to the brain cells; or rarely through sense deprivation, as in the loss of sight and hearing, there results an arrest of mental development.

Epilepsy is frequently the cause of mental defect. While in many of these cases it is difficult to distinguish cause from effect, it is evident that frequent and severe convulsions while the brain is rapidly growing do interfere with its development; yet in many cases both the epilepsy and the mental condition are due to the same underlying cause—an unstable nervous heredity.

With regard to the number of this class of mental defectives, a conservative estimate is one to about five hundred of the normal population. Placing the population of the State of Pennsylvania at seven millions, we find this gives us in the neighborhood of fourteen thousand. The question then arises, both from a humane and an economic standpoint, what are we going to do for them?

The modern solution of the problem is to provide institutions and training schools; and we are now caring for a little more than three thousand in the three institutions of the State—Elwyn, Spring City and Polk—which are especially equipped for this purpose; but the institution accommodations of the State are entirely inadequate to accommodate all who need such care. Quite a number are housed in the various County Homes; some are serving terms in the reformatory and penal institutions, and many more are at large, and being deficient in moral control, they are unable to conduct themselves properly, and are likely to develop into criminals or become victims of the designing.

The institution then performs a twofold duty: (1) to safeguard the interests of society against the special peculiarities of the defective; whether they be active or passive. (2) To protect the defective against the evil suggestions and pernicious influence of certain elements of society; and at the same time develop him to the fullest possible extent, in order that his life may be made happy, and, in many cases, useful.

With regard to the training of this class of individuals, the idea has been advanced that, since we cannot cure them or qualify them to make their own way in the world—the idea of which has been abandoned—it is useless to spend time and money upon them. This is a great mistake. Quite a number of these persons possess habits and propensities which make them a decided menace to society. Part of these are inborn, but many of them are the result of neglect and abuse; and there can be no doubt that judicious and systematic training will do much to prevent their development.

Training not only results in a lessening of evil; it is attended with positive good. While with the idiot about all that can be expected is some improvement in their personal habits and cleanliness, or possibly the doing of some minor errands, in the milder degrees of defect many of them become capable of useful and remunerative work.

When the condition is once diagnosed the question should be met fairly and squarely, and the parents informed that the child should be placed in a suitable training school before he reaches the age when the possibility of training shall have gone by forever.

Parents, as a rule, are slow to notice defect in their children, and often take offense if acquainted of the fact by the conscientious physician. Too often they are relieved by the assurance of the physician or friends that the child is simply backward and will yet come out all right.

Contrary to the general impression, mentally defective children do much better when placed with children of their own mental capacity than when placed with normal children. They meet each other and can associate on a more equal basis. They play and work together and are stimulated by the spirit of rivalry. Tasks and lessons can be assigned them which are within their grasp, and they can feel that they are accomplishing something, and so take pride in their work. Simple amusements can be provided for them, and, on the whole, they live happy and contented lives, providing they are placed in an institution before they have become accustomed to roaming the streets and living lives of idleness. If they are cut off from the allurements of the world after they have once had a taste of them, they are restless and uneasy and are more difficult to deal with.

By caring for this class of people apart from the world, much can be done toward lessening the propagation of their species. The two chief obstacles to this at present are that we have no way of holding them in the institution if their friends cannot be persuaded of the danger of taking them out into the world; and, secondly, the lack of room in the institutions for all requiring such care.

We must not become too enthusiastic, however, along this line, and think we can entirely prevent the birth of feeble-minded children, either by isolation, the prevention of their marriage, or by sterilization by operation; for as long as the human race lasts we shall have the feeble-minded with us in goodly numbers.

President Ochse here introduced Dr. R. M. Little, President of the State Conference of Charities and Corrections of Pennsylvania, who was received with applause and said:

ADDRESS OF DR. R. M. LITTLE.

Ladies and Gentlemen:

Coming into your conference at this hour, I hardly know what to say to you other than to speak briefly about the Executive Committee that has been in session at the hotel for the State Conference of Charities and Corrections which will meet in Pittsburg November 14th, 15th, and 16th. The Executive Committee has been going over the program as it is being arranged and perfected. The preceding conference appoints the officers for the next year and they arrange the place of meeting and the topics, assigning it in sections with certain persons as chairman of each section.

The conference will be held in Carnegie Institute Lecture Hall. It is a delightful place to meet, and all who can come are welcome, and most especially do we invite you who are here to-day—the members of the Association of the Directors of the Poor. Those who have been concerned in starting the State Conference of Charities and Corrections are deeply concerned that we might come into hearty co-operation with this old conference of the Directors of the Poor, hoping that at an early time we might find ourselves meeting at the same time and in the same city, and probably holding together some joint conference.

I regret not being here earlier to have enjoyed your proceedings and to have placed this subject before you at an earlier hour. For the problems we all have to deal with, whether from the point of view of the public official or as citizens of the Commonwealth, are the same, and we need to bring to bear upon their solution all the resources of the State and all the experience of those who are qualified to teach us, and we can help one another. A common floor of discussion of methods and of institutions and of principles and ideals and of causes and effects are of fundamental importance, not only to us, but to the Commonwealth, and to the structure of society, which we are endeavoring to serve.

I would plead, therefore, this afternoon that if it be possible—and of course this may be intruding something into your deliberations, which will not be proper—but I desire to throw out the suggestion that, while you have decided to go to Erie next year, that if it be possible to have a reconsideration of that and leave it with your Executive Committee to meet with our Executive Committee to try to arrange to meet in some other city. We are due east of the Alleghenies next October. We ought to go to Wilkes-Barre or Scranton or some other place, for it is necessary for us to go back and forth across the State, and if your association could arrange to go east of the Alleghenies I can assure you that the State Conference of Charities and Corrections would find it possible to meet at the same time and in the same place and to work out some partial program that would be mutually acceptable. It would be greatly to our advantage to meet where you meet and enjoy your proceedings, and I might express the hope that our conference would be of advantage to you, and that we would find it mutually advantageous to have the evening meetings together.

I thank you for your kindness. (Applause.)

Mr. Weller is called for. He said: It occurred to me that one short story might be of interest. So far as I know it is the first case of extradicting a wife deserter, in the city of Pittsburg. This man has a very good wife and a number of children. He had a quarrel with his wife, and left. He went to Superior, Wis., and we found he had a good position there. We have in the Associated Charities a Committee on Desertion and Compulsory Support, and we put them to work to see if we could compel this man to support his wife. We got the District Attorney to ask for extradition. The Governor granted the request, and the Governor of Wisconsin co-operated, and it was up to the Associated Charities of Pittsburg to send a Deputy to Superior and we paid the fare and brought the man back. The extradition worked, under the present law. The man was taken before the Judge and he issued an order on him of $6 a week; a bond was given and the man has a job and has been working a number of months and paying $6 a week regularly to his wife. We figured it out that our $80 that this cost us, if expended in relief to this woman, would have been exhausted very soon, but in spending it to bring the man back to his responsibility we secured the payment of the $6 a week to the wife for an indefinite number of weeks.

I only cite this story as an illustration. We are deeply interested in this matter.

I offer it as a demonstration of the fact that the present law in Pennsylvania will work. That all you need is that the District Attorney of your district shall ask for extradition and back you up in it. In Pittsburg we have almost reached the point where the District Attorney will pay the expenses of the extradition; and recently he has given us encouragement that in the next case he will deem it possible to pay the expense himself.

This story gives briefly the key-note to what I am to say about Associated Charities. In Pittsburg we try to bring to the families two forces—competent personal service and co-operation; and we spent this money, not for relief of food or fuel or shelter or clothing, but for the forces upon which practically all effort depends for success—competent personal service and co-operation. In this case co-operation meant bringing into actually working together the Governors of two States, and the police authorities of two cities, and a resourceful person who furnished the money. Eight or ten different organizations of individuals co-operated—co-operation in the sense of definite, united, team-playing.

Competent personal service in the sense that this work was worked out—the man was traced to Superior, and the District Attorney was interested, in Pittsburg, and all the steps were followed out by a worker who was paid $50 a month. If preventive and constructive work is to grow up in our community must it not come as it has in the medical profession?

Within the last forty or fifty years the whole modern development of medicine and surgery has come about with its training schools and its scientific knowledge.

I look and hope for the time to come when philanthropy shall be so organized and systematized and strengthened that charity will come into its own, because it is scientific as well as sympathetic. A better condition of life will be brought about. (Applause.)

President Ochse here read the following telegram of congratulation and wishes of success to the convention from Mrs. H. L. Rankin:

Philadelphia, Pa., Oct. 11, 1911.

Henry W. Ochse, President Association of Charities.

Congratulations and best success to you and members of convention.

MRS. HUGH L. RANKIN.

The Rev. W. Henry Thompson, President of the Children's Home Society of Pittsburg, was here introduced and read an interesting paper on "Environment versus Heredity."

PAPER BY THE REV. THOMPSON.

"Environment Versus Heredity."

Improvement by environment is better than correction by law, regulation by penalty, or restriction by force. Law erects the penitentiary, puts limitations upon actions, and restrictions upon conduct. All theories which are founded in mere law are necessarily restrictive rather than constructive. They find their inspiration in suspicion and distrust, and are predicated upon belief in the eternal baseness of the individual. Heredity assumes in its last analysis that child nature is the battleground upon which certain parental traits must fight it out for an uncertain victory.

We do not deny the fact of heredity. Living beings doubtless transmit to their offspring a portion of those traits peculiar to themselves, and in saying that we are going much further than merely affirming that "like begets like." To say "like begets like" is merely to say that a tree begets a tree and animals beget animals. Heredity refers to the transmission of traits of one class or species to the same class or species, as color of hair or eyes, and in the human species, of feature and dispositions.

In general there are two theories of heredity. One the mechanical, the other the psychological. The most recent conclusions of research are that the further you get from the physiological, and the further you go into the higher nature, the more complex becomes the study and the more uncertain the results. In fact, the true field of heredity is in the subordinate sphere. Its manifestations are only certain in the lower planes of life.

Environment is the sum of those influences which serve to mold the individual. The sum of all that modifies the mental and social character of the individual. It has been said that heredity and environment are the master influences of the organic world. We affirm that heredity takes second, and not first, place in the intellectual and also in the moral realm. It does not control the psychical being. To the mighty and constant power of environment must be given the supreme place in the economy of man. It is the architect of heredity.

Heredity touches the individual only at one point. Environment touches him at every point and at every moment. Heredity is a straight line. Environment is an all-circling sphere. Heredity is only a memory—it refers to the past; environment is a constant hope—it reaches out into the future and molds destinies. Heredity is of the earth earthy; it is limited to the little area of the physical being. Environment treats man as the center of the universe and makes all forces, all oceans and continents, all constellations and stars serve him. Heredity is the fatalism of sociology; it leaves no place for the operation of the will, but forces the individual blindly and irresistibly on by the grim law of necessity. It is the paralysis of the moral nature, deadening all sense of accountability, and if the conscience awakens out of some nightmare of guilt, it salves itself with the cowardly wail, "It could not be helped."

We cannot select our parents or elect our ancestors, but we can select our environment. All true charity work aims to improve and adjust the environment of others. In such efforts the inspiration of a hopeful faith is essential.

Just to the extent to which the mind is imbued with mechanical theories of heredity will there be a paralysis of sympathy and effort. It is the death of the sublime optimism so essential to helpful work for others. Tell us they are in the coils of an irreversible law and the most enthusiastic will cool off and give up effort. It is only the irresistible conviction that there is a possible otherwise for each case that justifies and inspires effort. Faith in moral freedom and human improvability only will nerve the will and confer ability to labor for the uplifting of others.

Heredity has about it no inherent remedy for decay. It has no antidote for degeneracy. The plant and the animal alike will, if left to themselves, return to primitive wildness. The only remedy is in the controlling processes of an imposed and helpful environment.

Now this has a practical bearing upon every form of sociological work. Environment is the potent factor in the care of the poor in or outside of the poorhouse. It furnishes the key by which Commissioners and Overseers of the Poor may find access to the highest and the best for their wards. It also offers to reformatory and correction workers ideals to aim at and methods to pursue. It is the remedy for the cure of crimes, and the tonic atmosphere in which the moral convalescents will find recovery.

The power of environment is especially available in dealing with the child. It is in the bud the wind most surely blights. It is in the sapling the twist is received which results in the knarl and knot.

The knowledge of fundamental child nature is necessary in selecting a suitable corrective environment. It will be particularly helpful if it can be ascertained what particular function may have been limited by heredity or vitiated by an unwholesome early environment. Whether the will has been undeveloped or overdeveloped; whether the imagination has been abnormally wrought upon so that it creates morbid pictures and invents fictitious standards of conduct, or whether the emotions have been enervated through unreal fears or superficial pleasures, or whether the sentiments of respect and reverence have been deadened. A skillful physician will be qualified to prescribe in proportion as he can first accurately diagnose the case. A selected environment should be justified by experience under like circumstances. All true remedial measures are the result of experimentation. Theories are well, but alike in the schools and professions fail in actual operation. It is not every student at the normal that is a normal student.

Now, if you look at the practical bearing of environment upon work for children, it will be well to remember:

1. It begins to operate very early. Earlier perhaps than we think. There is a purely physical environment prior to birth. Sensation is then the sole agency. Of this we may not speak further than to say: Purity of thought, hopefulness of spirit, sereneness of temper are calculated to affect the texture and nature of the child more advantageously than a corrupt, sullen, or querulous spirit.

By obtaining correct knowledge of parentage one will know what needs to be neutralized and what developed. A knowledge of child antecedents as well as child nature will be an aid in adjusting it to more suitable environment.

2. It should be adapted to the stage of the child's development.

This will involve a knowledge of the processes by which child nature unfolds, for instance:

At the age of one month the child is largely a mere bundle of immature instinct. It sees objects, becomes amenable instinctively to pain and pleasure. Mental action is only in the dim dawn.

At the age of three months there begins to follow in orderly succession:

(a) The dawning of consciousness. The child by its steady gaze at you seems to say, "I know I am here. I don't know who I am, but who are you?" You leave the room and return, the child seems to remember you were there once before and are there again. Its little optics follow your movements. There is the beginning of the recognition of persons, things, and places.

(b) Then there is the awakening of the emotions. The crying for your presence. Fear when you are absent. Glad at your return. The automatic reaching out for playthings. If a boy, a horse; if a girl, for a doll. Though so early it is the mother or nurse that usually determines the kind of toy, unconsciously perhaps, but through their knowledge of the sex. The child is too young to discriminate.

(c) It is time now for the assertive faculty to operate. The will commences its insipient manifestations. It shows displeasure with something and resents your right to impose some dose or dope. If it does not show pugnacity, it does display tenacity, and often a vigorous insistence.

(d) About this time the imagination takes on activity, showing itself in definite joy, grief, emulation, or being pleased when you are pleased, and contrariwise.

At five or six months the intellect defines itself, words are caught, and their meanings learned—monosyllables, of course.

At seven months the reasoning powers begin—showing pride, shame, passion, and a sense of the incongruous which is an appreciation of the ludicrouse. These all arise from inferences.

Gradually an indefinite sense of morality will appear, which is usually accompanied with the articulation of sounds. At twenty months the moral sense becomes definite. Judgment, recollection, and self-control become definite and manifest.

At the age of three years the intellect and heart, the mind and emotions, unite in the manifestation of superstitious fears. Afraid of the dark and of ghosts. They are no longer fearful of "big black bears" since the "Teddy Bear" has robbed it of harm and filled it with charm. At four years the child becomes initiative.

Soon averice dawns in the form of selfishness, envy in the guise of spitefulness, vanity in the appreciation of and love of beauty. All this is crowned with awe in the presence of religion. It is now that the child may experience remorse and can be taught courtesies and civilities.

It has been said that at the age of ten years child life is either a state of melancholia or of ecstacy.

Now at some point in the unfolding of this strange thing, which we call a child, you find it wilting under neglect, crushed by cruelty, enervated by disease, vitiated by vice. The duty is imposed upon you, imposed by your calling to charity work, or by your official position. So diverse are conditions that no mechanical or routine arrangements will avail. You cannot throw them into your charity hopper and grind them through. They are as clay in the hands of the potter, but it is not your business to turn them into bricks. If you line them up in institutions you may compress them into similars, but it will be at the expense of individually. You cannot throw them into the poorhouse. To do so is to treat them as refuse. They are plants, and more. They are animals, and more. They need soil and freedom, a place and an area, and more. They are possible geniuses, possible angels, possible gods. That is the same as saying they have in them, if neglected, the possibility of intellectual dullards and social devils.

Whatever it is proposed to do by environment, it must be remembered that heredity in each case has left the child with a certain innateness, which is its very own—a tendency, a bias, a bent. Circumstances may have strengthened that inclination, which may be up or down. It must not be overlooked that what we call heredity is a constant and heavy pressure in that direction, be it up or down. There is no change inherent in it. Gravity cannot reverse itself to save a man who has slipped over the brink of the precipice. It should be equally born in mind that while heredity moves in a straight line, environment is an all-enveloping sphere pressing in from every side. Environment is a sphere filled, an atmosphere with pressure, and electrical. It is the home, the street, the school, the social circle. It is breathed, it appeals to eye, ear, touch, and stirs emotion by its vivid appeals to the mind and imagination. The eye should not see the immodest or nude in picture or on billboard, the ear should not hear the lewd, and whatever may taint the imagination should be most scrupulously guarded against. It should be the aim to make the child's realm like the "Holy Jerusalem descending out of heaven"—it should be "clear as crystal." It is possible by our crude and coarse methods of attempted remedy to defeat our own purpose by inadvertently teaching what had better be unnamed. Solon refused to enact a law in Athens against a crime not yet committed, lest the law suggest the crime, and some one straightway go and commit it.

In selecting an environment, it is only going back to Nature and first principles in securing for the child home life. Its own home, of course, but a home with all that signifies the place in which to derive results from a true atmosphere.

If the child must have another home than its own, and that must be selected for it, the following general and tentative principles suggest themselves:

AGE.

1. Infants should not be placed with couples who are well past the age of childbearing. Husband not over forty-five, wife forty.

2. The ideal is to place an infant with a young childless couple married three years. Disappointed maternity prepares the way.

3. Boys aged twelve or over are better not placed with farmers over fifty years, unless they may have a son of mature age and positively clean and steady habits.

4. Boys under nine with youngerly people, who have no children.

5. Girls of twelve or over with farmers not over forty and who have no boys of similar age.

6. Children of intermediate age are better with young people who have not gotten altogether away from the memory of their youth

TEMPERAMENT.

7. Not place a child whose record and manner indicate distinct physiological limitations with people of high social ideals and educational expectations. There can be no congeniality established.

8. The child of active nervous temperament should not be placed with people of vociferous speech on either side of the house. It is the child of vociferous parents that acquires the habit of answering back.

9. No boy or girl is born gentle, obedient, or truthful; therefore, each must acquire these traits. Gentleness is not induced by stormy expostulations or rebukes, but by example. The moral quality of actions and the moral meaning of words also are more quickly and permanently learned through example than precept.

10. It should be impressed upon foster-parents that they will be imitated in eating, drinking, speech, gait, table mannerisms, and especially in their hypocrises.

MORALITIES.

11. Wrongdoing in the child is relative. Every child is subjected to a double standard of ethics. One the father's, the other the mother's. This fact is too often lost sight of in our judgments, and may, by confusing the child, have much to do with producting its so-called obliquities of conduct.

12 There is a normal naughtiness as well as an abnormal. One the outflowing of the undirected child nature, the other the expression of its perverted nature. But the perversions may arise wholly from a bad environment, just as health may be lost through exposure to a malarial atmosphere.

DISCIPLINE.

13. Rigid exactness is better than neglectful laxness. But tidiness in the home, orderliness without and in the business, with wise and firm discipline in school, will induce obedience in the life of the boy or girl. The child takes its most effective corrections by indirectness, rather than by absorption than infliction.

14. It is better not to see half a child does. This will save parents from much unnecessary annoyance and prevent them from the crime of nagging the child into willfulness.

15. Two things may well be held in mind:

First. Each several and separate child needs as the complement of its life the care of a woman with the true mother sense and instinct.

Second. Each several and separate child has a place in the world; that place is not so far away but you can reach it. It is for you to find that place for that child, get the child into it, and see that it becomes permanently fitted into that place.

Prof. P. H. Bridenbaugh, of Blair, presented the following resolutions, which, upon motion, were adopted:

RESOLUTIONS ON STRICT MARRIAGE LAW.

Resolved, That some legal provision should be made to enable the authorities to restrain women who are defective mentally and morally during the child-bearing age.

Resolved, That we should have a strict marriage-license law, prohibiting the marriage of persons mentally defective and having transmittable diseases.

H. FRANK ESHELMAN,
P. H. BRIDENBAUGH.

President Ochse: Our business is concluded. Before laying down the gavel I wish to say to my successor that in my nineteen years' connection with this Association I have made many new friends and associates that I prize highly. This will probably be the end of my work as a Director of the Poor, as, unfortunately, I fell "in between," at the last primaries. Nevertheless, I cannot forget the many pleasant associations I have had among the members of this Association. And if possible I will be with you hereafter, at least at some of your meetings—if not in person, I certainly will be in spirit.

I again thank you for the honor you conferred upon me in electing me as your President. (Applause.)

Mr. Colborn at this point requested Judge Telford, of the Courts of Indiana County, to make a few remarks.

Judge Telford said: I thank you for giving me an opportunity to say a word to this convention. After all the instructive addresses we have listened to during the sessions of the convention I would not propose to say anything that would be instructive, but I desire to say a word in appreciation. We have looked forward to the meetings of this convention with great expectations and we have not been disappointed.

It is pleasant to us to see the faces of those whose names have been familiar to us as leaders in the lines of work they represent, and I think all who have attended this convention must have profited by the information they have received. I trust that it may be a pleasure to the Association at some time to meet with us again. I am sure it will be our pleasure to receive you. (Applause.)

Mr. Smith (Chester): I would like to say a word on the resolutions just adopted. I am impressed with their importance to a greater extent than almost anything else that has come before us. They are the foundation of preventative legislation. Those who have been closely identified with the work of caring for our unfortunates realize that much of the pauper element comes from the two sources here referred to.

Do not go home and forget about these resolutions, but if successful legislation is to come from it, we must agitate the public mind. The public, as a mass, know very little about this and you should talk it up; educate your legislators and your people.

President Ochse: I have the great pleasure of introducing to you my successor, whom you have elected as your President for the ensuing year, the Hon. H. Frank Eshelman, of Lancaster.

Mr. Eshelman was received with applause and said:

Mr. President, Ladies, and Gentlemen.

I want to thank you for the compliment you have paid me in electing me to this office. Since I have been apprised of the election, I have been thinking very hard. While my interest was alive in the Association before it is tenfold more so now.

I would say that all parties who wish to have any sort of information whatever that I can give, please consider yourselves entirely free to write me upon any subject. If I cannot answer it I will see that information is forwarded to you.

I would ask every member to store up ideas between now and the next meeting on all subjects with reference to this great work, and be loaded full of information for the next meeting. Don't wait until a week or two before the next meeting, but begin now, and be ready.

I hope I can grasp the main and important elements of the great questions before us, to make this work of the Association effective. We have a place of meeting selected; it doesn't suit all members, perhaps, but we must be loyal. Let us work harmoniously and try and have a large and successful convention.

We are certain of two lines of work that must be looked after. The preventive end of the evils we are battling and trying to do all we can along that line (and that is a hint to the Program Committee). Now try to do all we can in stopping the flood of evils, rather than in correcting the evils that have been made. Also the productive end—that is, we must have money. We get part of it from appropriations, but which will be the easier; to constantly ask that they be enlarged and enlarged, or to try to produce in our institutions as much as we can to help ourselves? We may find that the producing of money to help ourselves will be easier than to constantly enlarge appropriations.

I promise you I shall do my duty, to the very last dot, and I again thank you, and hope for the co-operation of all. (Applause.)

Col. E. P. Gould (Erie): I wish to offer a resolution: "That the officers elected and the Locale Committee be authorized to fix the time of holding the next meeting."

The motion was carried.

Mrs. E. S. Lindsey (Warren): I have been exceedingly silent at this convention, and the principal reason is that I brought my better half.

I am reminded of the Yankee lady who went through the Museum of the Vatican and saw a fine statue of Apollo, and next to the statue of Apollo the statue of a very meek-faced, brow-beaten woman, and she exclaimed, "Here is Apollo, and this must be Apollinaris, his wife." (Laughter.)

You have always had Apollinaris, but this time you had Apollo. I wanted to say one word of thanks to dear Mrs. Williard, who has made this such a charming occasion, and I could not leave without offering my personal thanks and the loving appreciation of the members of the Children's Aid Society of Western Pennsylvania, who are Mrs. Williard's stalwart supporters and intense admirers, and I would move that we give a standing vote of thanks to Mrs. Williard for the part she has taken in making this convention the great success it has been.

Mrs. Lindsey's motion was unanimously carried.

Mrs. Williard (Indiana): The pleasure is not all on the part of the delegates to this convention. It has been a great pleasure to me, to meet these people in my own home town. I have been attending these conventions for many years, and I consider it one of the most pleasant spots in my life.

The convention here adjourned sine die.

MRS. SUE WILLIARD

A Pioneer in the Children's Aid Society and This Association, to Whose Activity and Interest the Association Is Indebted for the Splendid Convention at Indiana.

RECEPTION

Wednesday, October 11, 1911.

Hon. John P. Elkin, through the officers of the Association, tendered a reception to the members, visitors, and citizens of the community to meet at his home this evening, at 8 o'clock.

Judge Elkin has one of the most beautiful homes in Western Pennsylvania. It was most beautifully decorated with choice cut flowers and vines, making it a bower of beauty. Judge and Mrs. Elkin and their very charming daughter, together with Judge and Mrs. Telford, Mrs. Williard, and Prof. James E. Ament most cordially and graciously received and welcomed the members to his palatial home, at once making everybody feel pleased to be there. An orchestra dispensed beautiful music during the evening. After greeting one another, the guests were escorted to the gymnasium, which was tastefully decorated with bunting, flags, etc., and where dainty and delightful refreshments were served by Miss Elkin, and a number of her very charming young lady associates in Indiana. After refreshments, all gathered into the spacious halls and parlors, where the President called upon Judge Elkin for a few remarks. He responded in a very pleasing address. He spoke of his appeciation of having this Association meet at his house and assured all of his sympathy and approval of their work. He gave a short history of the founding of Indiana, its progress, and its outlook. He paid a fine tribute to the Indiana State Normal School, its equipment, and to the great number of men and women, who have gone out from this school as graduates and who are now occupying positions of honor and trust throughout Pennsylvania, as well as the Nation.

The Judge made a comparison between country and city; he humorously said he was in politics a while, and gave a detailed description of his touring the State, "in the interest of certain candidates," and in going through "the northern tier of counties, I was impressed with the beautiful scenery, the magnificent timber then growing, as well as the beautiful farms dotted here and there through these counties."

Continuing, Judge Elkin said: "I landed at Coudersport at 3 o'clock and I am sure there were 500 people there—the streets were line with carriages—the finest turnout of carriages that I had seen in Pennsylvania. That night the meetings were so large we had to hold them in the Courthouse, and it was lighted with electricity, and I saw as many handsome women and young girls there as I had seen in any place in the State. We met splendid people there. I expected it would be a primitive community. I tell you you will find such people all over Pennsylvania. It is a surprise to go about the State and see the sturdy and refined people you will meet in all parts of the State. If I were choosing a city to live in in America I would choose Philadelphia. But sometimes our Philadelphia friends get the notion that all the cultured people are there. Don't you believe it. We have as capable lawyers in the country as in the city. It is true some city lawyers develop a vast capacity for work. John G. Johnson is a wonderful man and Mr. Watson, of Pittsburg, is another one. But for capable work the country lawyer need not take a back seat for anybody. You have them in Allegheny and in Somerset County (Applause).

In my judgment no better people live anywhere than right here in Indiana. The Scotch-Irish wandered over the mountains from the Cumberland Valley 125 years ago. They came with the Bible, and they have held up the morals of the people and have developed good men and women. I don't think a better Judge ever sat on the Supreme Bench than the late Silas Strong. In Greensburg they had Henry B. Foster, and in Jefferson County George A. Jenks, who back in the 70's was Solicitor-General, and he argued some cases that have gone into the legal literature of the country, and he was recognized as one of the leading lawyers of the State.

I say this as a word of encouragement to those who live in the country districts. For myself I like to live in the country. I think it is good to get you feet close to the ground. It is a good thing to live in a community where you know your neighbor's names, and who gossip and talk about you. In the city the man at No. 900 may not know the man who lives at No. 910. It is a good thing to be in touch with your neighbors.

I am delighted as I can be that you thought proper to come here and pay your respects to us. We will always have the right hand of fellowship for you. Come as often as you desire to come. We will entertain you the best we know how. (Applause).

On motion of Col. Gould, of Erie, a vote of thanks was tendered Judge and Mrs. Elkin for their entertainment of the delegates.

*Note—$15,071.71 is for the quarter ending November 30, 1909.

Board of Directors—H. W. Ochse, President, Etna, Pa.; J. McB. Robb, Secretary, Oakdale, Pa.; William Bennett, Braddock, Pa.; J. Lewis Srodes, M. D., Medical Superintendent.

BLAIR COUNTY.

Report of Blair County Hospital for Insane, Hollidaysburg, Pa., for the year ending December 31, 1910:

The net cost for operating the hospital for the year 1910 was $28,463.23. The net earnings were $31,079.70 leaving a net profit (on all cost charges except interest on investment) of $2,616.47.

Comparisons between years 1908-09-10.

	1908	1909	1910
Net cost for year	$21,425.35	$27,280.46	$28,463.23
Cash earnings	15,143.73	23,552.16	31,079.70
Cost to county	6,281.60	3,728.30	2,616.47 profit
Average number patients	146	186	208
Gross average cost	2.82 2/10	2.82 3/10	2.66 1/100
Net average cost to Co.	.95 9/10	.38 53/100	No Cost

The above figures for the years 1908-9-10 include not only maintenance and ordinary repairs, but also permanent improvements and furniture. The cost to the county to operate, repair, and improve the institution was reduced by about 40 per cent in 1909, as compared with 1908, and further reduced in 1910 to such an extent that we show earnings for the year totalling $2,616.47.

For the first time in the history of hospitals for the insane in Pennsylvania has any such institution been able to show any profit on its maintenance account. If Blair County were still keeping her insane in State hospitals, the cost to the county would have been approximately $18,000. The actual cost to the county, if the interest charges is counted for 1910, is $3,383.59, as against $9,728.30 in 1909, and $12,281.60 in 1908. The extra earnings are made in the large increase in the private patient account, in the extra allowance from the State and in the earnings from the truck patch, chicken yard, etc.

The number of patients in the house January 1, 1910, was 207, with 20 on parole. During the year we admitted 94, discharged 65, and 32 died. On December 31, 1910, we had remaining in the house 209 and 15 on parole.

Of the 65 patients discharged, 35 left the house restored, 21 convalescent or improved, and 9 unimproved; of the 21 patients discharged convalescent or improved, 11 have fully recovered; the balance either belonged to incurable disorders or were not heard from.

The following are some of the improvements made during the year: A pool and billiard room was furnished and equipped for the male department. A temporary greenhouse was built. About 12,000 cubic yards of earth were moved, continuing the system of grading and filling laid out in 1909. This year was started a new vegetable garden, part of which was furnished with the Skinner irrigating system, making it possible to have lettuce, radishes, etc., earlier in the season and also in August and September, which heretofore was practically impossible. A poultry house to accommodate 900 fowls was built and is occupied.

CHESTER COUNTY CHILDREN'S AID SOCIETY.

Summarizing the present conditions of our Aid Society, we find the year's work closes with renewed hope, inspired by the constant faithfulness and well-equipped effort—manifested by our earnest workers.

The work of finding good homes and fitting children into them, then the quiet tilling and seed-planting have been persistently performed.

During the year 32 children have been added to our number. At this date there are under our care 180 county wards, 139 in free homes, and 41 in boarding homes. The ever-willing, cordial, active support of our Directors of the Poor and officials of the County Home, with their assistance in the way of finances, has been truly helpful and we owe them our gratefulness.

Thus we continue to labor, trusting under the protection of a home with all that it implies, we will save if possible our helpless, hapless boys and girls, giving to them a new-found joy and life be made worth the living.

Thirty-eighth Annual Convention

OF THE

ASSOCIATION OF

Directors of the Poor and Charities

OF THE STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA

Held at Erie, Pennsylvania

OCTOBER 15, 16 AND 17, 1912

The Thirty-eighth Annual Convention of the Directors of the Poor and Charities of Pennsylvania convened in the Court House at Erie, Pa., on Tuesday morning, October 15th, 1912, at 9:30 a. m., and after half an hour spent in registering and forming acquaintances, etc., the Convention was called to order by Hon. H. Frank Eshelman, President of the Association.

Prayer was offered by Rev. Clyde Wright of the Simpson Methodist church, of Erie:

Heavenly Father, we come this morning seeking Thy guidance, and we thank Thee for the power that has brought us together, for the gift of mind and the strength of body and the inclination of heart that has brought us to acknowledge Thee. We thank Thee for Thy love to us; for the multitude of blessings Thou hast bestowed upon us. We ask Thy special blessing upon this gathering. We ask Thy guidance for these men and women facing great problems of adversity and of need, of selfishness and wrong, which are always calling for sympathy, and for compassion. May the spirit of Christ lead them in their deliberations and guide them in the great work to which Thou hast called them. We ask it in the name of Thy Son our Savior, Amen.

President Eshelman: We shall be favored by two songs, rendered by Mrs. C. W. McKean of this City, "Joy of the Morning" and "A Proposal." Mrs. McKean will be accompanied by Mrs. A. A. Colby.

The singing of Mrs. McKean was greatly appreciated and enjoyed by the delegates.

Hon. William J. Stern, Mayor of Erie, extended the Greetings and Freedom of the City in the following address:

Mayor Stern was received with applause.

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen: If I needed an inspiration in choosing words to welcome you that beautiful couplet of Burns', printed on the front of your programme—

"Affliction's sons are brothers in distress,

A brother to relieve, how exquisite the bliss," would be a sufficient inspiration.

Mr. President, there have been many Conventions held in the City of Erie, but I consider this one of the most important ever held here, for the reason that you are gathered here in the interests of humanity, and there is no work so ennobling as the work of Charity. As Time goes on the people are coming closer together. They have broader sympathies for one another. You who are gathered here are the men and women who represent the charitable institutions of the great State of Pennsylvania, not only officially, but you are the men and women who give your time and your money for the help of others.

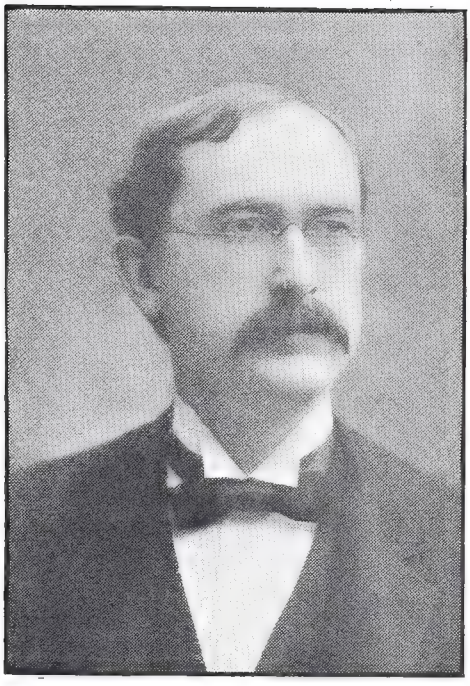
It is my duty, and my pleasure, to extend to you the greetings of the City of Erie. The work of the institutions to which you belong makes it possible that charity may be distributed in a practical manner. You have erected appropriate buildings for the care of the insane and of the afflicted, throughout the State, and you are giving your time to the study of the problems that confront us in the amelioration of the sufferings of the poor and unfortunate.

We want you to take some time, while you are present with us, to see industrial Erie, to see beautiful Erie, and to enjoy the hospitality of our people. We are glad to entertain you and will be glad to show you our industrial plants throughout the City, in which are employed thousand of men and women. We want you to see our streets, and our homes, and our splendid public buildings. We have a moral and an educated people here. We have spelndid churches. There never has been a call for public institutions or for public charities that our people have not responded to. During the last two years we have contributed more than $400,000 for public and charitable institutions. We have built a new Y. M. C. A. building at a cost of about $200,000 that is a credit to the City, and have built additions to our Hospitals and other institutions for the care of the suffering and the needy. We have a splendidly-organized Bureau of Charities in the City.



I note that the programme takes you on a trip to the Soldiers & Sailors' Home, and also to our Poor Farm, institutions which you will find are splendidly managed. Our County Home reflects much credit upon our Directors of the Poor and our County Commissioners. Upon these men is imposed a great responsibility, and I am sure that the papers and discussions during this Convention will be of much assistance to our Directors and County Commissioners, and I sincerely hope, in which hope I am joined by thousands of our citizens, that the Thirty-eighth Annual Convention of the Directors of the Poor and Charities of Pennsylvania, will be the greatest in the history of your organization. (Applause)

President Eshelman: The address of welcome is by one who always says the right thing: At least the Records of the Superior and Supreme Courts of Pennsylvania would show that to be true, for he is hardly ever reversed. I introduce to you his Honor, Judge Emory A. Walling, of Erie.

ADDRESS OF WELCOME.

Judge Walling was received with applause, and said:

Mr. President, ladies and gentlemen: It is a genuine pleasure to me to join with our Mayor in extending to you a word of welcome on this occasion. We have had other Conventions, in the past, but we have had none that we appreciate more than this splendid gathering of American citizenship; these men and women who are devoting the best years of their lives to the work of helping the unfortunate throughout the State. I suppose the reason I was asked to say something to you was that the Mayor's jurisdiction is limited to the City, and your Committee thought you might want to wander through the County and the jurisdiction of the Court extends over the netire County. This is a large County. You won't get beyond the hospitality of the citizens of this County. You can go to the center of the Lake and still be in Erie County; You can go to the State of New York, and also to Ohio, and still be in Erie County. I believe in the people of Erie County: I have a soft spot in my heart for the old County of Erie. Just take a trip down through the grape-belt; help yourselves to all you want—at least you may do so on my farm, and I guess you can anywhere. I think the Mayor has a farm down there, too.

HON. EMORY A. WALLING,

President Judge of the Courts of Erie County, Pennsylvania, who, in a very able and interesting Address, welcomed the Members to Erie, and added so much to the interest of the Convention and Entertainment of the Members.

I think some one ought to get up an automobile excursion and take you down through the grape-belt. I throw out that suggestion.

(Applause)

I want to throw out another suggestion: I am proud of Pennsylvania, and I am proud that so many of you have come here from all parts of the State, to meet with us. This is a wonderful State, with its splendid American citizenship, unsurpassed by any Commonwealth, or by any country in the world; but in all this great Commonwealth we haven't any suitable place for the man who becomes the victim of alcoholism. We had a case in court only yesterday, of a man who normally is as bright as you or I, but there is no place to send him but to the Warren Insane Asylum. We have another case of the same kind, tomorrow. I think that the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania ought to establish an Inebriate asylum, where such unfortunate men can receive care and treatment. I throw out this suggestion, and if we give you this ride down into the country in automobiles we shall expect you to take hold and help build such an institution. (Applause)

I believe all that the Mayor has said about Erie, and you will find it out before you have been here a week, and you want to stay here at least a week. We say to you that Erie is the finest city of its size in the world; you don't have to prove it, we all admit it.

We want you to look over our charitable institutions, because you are experts in those lines. We want you to make suggestions that will help us. We want you to go and see our County Home, and tell us how to run it. We want you to see our Orphan Homes and Hospitals. We would like to have you go to Elmwood Home, and other institutions, and then criticise us and tell us what to do. We are public officials; at least those of us who are not are probably sorry for it (Laughter). We must all perform our duties as becomes American citizens of the Twentieth century. We must be earnest and zealous in the public service. The man or woman who holds a public trust for what money he can get out of it is living a low and sordid life. The best we can get out of it is the memory that we have lived an honest life and have been faithful to our trust. A public official should never think that he represents merely a political party, much less a political machine, but he should stand for all that is best and stand on business principles. (Applause)

Say, we want you to have a good time this year, but we want you to all come back next year and help us celebrate Perry's victory. It was the proudest day in the history of old Erie when Commodore Perry came sailing back into our harbor on that quiet September morning.

Next year we want you all to come here; we want the people to come from all parts of the United States, and the President of the United States—I guess I won't tell yo uwho he is to be, now—(laughter.) When you do come back we will show you a better and a greater Erie. The Mayor pointed out to you Industrial Erie, but the proudest possession we have is our citizenship. We want you all to have a good time here, and if you get into any trouble you have the Mayor and the Court on your side. (Applause.)

President Eshelman: There can be nothing more laudable than devoting one's life to service. The next address will be given by one who has devoted her whole life to the service of others, in the most noble way. A remarkable example, that would adorn any home or any life. We will listen to the address of welcome to the Ladies and Children's Aid Society by Miss Sarah Reed of this City.

ADDRESS OF MISS SARAH REED.

Miss Reed was received with applause and spoke as follows:

It is a great pleasure to bid you welcome here. After the addresses by the Mayor and the Court it remains for me simply to echo that welcome ,and especially to the Ladies and Children's Aid Society.

Sometimes pessimists say that the world is not growing any better. But such an Assembly as this is an answer in the negative to that assertion. When men and women will leave their homes and their work, and will give their time and their money and their earnest thought to the question of how to better the condition of those who are less comfortable than ourselves, then we know that the Savior of the world did not come in vain, and that the world is actually growing nearer to that Model that was set before it. One of the encouraging works is the work that the Ladies' Aid Society is engaged in and the work that the societies are doing for saving the children. If we can set the feet of the children in the right paths and make them clean of heart and pure of life we shall have a country that there will be no need to worry over who is to be President, for it will be controlled by a high moral standard and will be safe at all times.

There is a wonderful advance in the care of little children: We shudder when we think that less than a hundred years ago children were hung for crimes which we now protect them for. We have Homes for them, like Elmwood Home: We don't put our little children in jail but we put them where they are taught self-respect, and taught that only that which is earned is of any account to us.

It was my privilege last spring to visit Farm, near Philadelphia, where there were four hundred girls: It was a great delight to see how they were bing made to see what life really is and what life is really worth. All these things are being brought about by meetings like this, where men and women gather, whose hearts are in the work.

Take care of the children and all will be well for the future. Your programme, and your President have given me a title I have no right to. I have to tell you I am not President of the Associated Charities of Erie. I am President of an organized charity in Erie, entering this month on its forty-sixth year: The Erie Home for the Friendless.

When that was organized it undertook to do all kinds of charitable work. Happily, as we have grown in knowledge our work has settled down to be simply the caring for two Homes, one for children and one for old ladies. Old gentlemen are not excluded, but they don't seem to knock at our doors. Too many women there, I think. We now have a fine property. We are not able to accommodate anything like the number of children we would like to take care of, and we always have a long waiting-list at our Old Ladies' Home. These institutions we feel are doing a great deal of good. I want you to know more about them than you do, so I will say that tomorrow afternoon from half past four to six o'clock I will be at the Old Ladies' Home, and I hope others of our Members and Officers will be there, and we will be very glad to have you come and see the Home. (Applause)

President Eshelman: We will next have the response from the wheel-horse, the man on whose shoulders the great motive power of this institution rests, Hon. L. C. Colborn.

Mr. Colborn was received with applause and addressed the Convention as follows:

ADDRESS OF HON. L. C. COLBORN.

Mr. President, Mayor Stern, Judge Walling, ladies and gentlemen: It is not of my own accord that I appear before you on a programme of my own making, but in asking the worthy President and the Honorable Secretary Col. Gould and the Assistant Secretary Mr. Bridenbaugh they all replied "You Are It." Therefore I am here on the Programme.

And to this very cordial greeting of the Mayor, and the Welcome of Judge Walling we most heartily return to you our thanks, and trust that this Meeting may be mutually beneficial to us all.

Mr. President, Mayor Stern, Judge Walling, ladies and gentlemen, and Members of the Association, To this very cordial and interesting Address of Welcome from you and the freedom of your city granted us by the Mayor, on behalf of the Members of the Association and visiting friends, I return our most sincere thanks, and trust that our stay within your gates may be mutually pleasant and profitable.

Your hospitality and welcome have been tested by this Association, this being the fourth time it has held its Convention in your City, and I can truthfully say the interest and members have grown at each succeeding meeting, which is evidence of their appreciation of your people and City.

I am pleased to see so large a number of ladies present at this, an opening meeting, and be welcomed by one of your accomplished daughters. I always feel like taking my hat off to the ladies of Erie on account of a very effective and curt reply of one of them to a young lady residing on the Canadian shore. I believe it is the custom on State and International occasions to fly the flags of both Nations, side by side, when a Canadian lady said, "Look at that old red and white rag along side of our royal flag, it reminds me of an old fashioned red and white striped stick of candy." No sooner had she made this remark until it was taken up by one of the fair ladies of this City and replied, "Yes, the kind that makes you sick every time you attempt to lick it." I honor the loyalty of the ladies of Erie, and am pleased to see so many present with us.

This Association having met in your City so frequently, you will be soon claiming it as an "heirloom," and reminds me of the pride and chargrin I experienced over my first pair of pantaloons. I have no doubt every man here remembers his first pantaloons. After much coaxing and great promises, my dear little sainted mother, long since passed into the great beyond, made me my first pants. She found a discarded pair of my father's, and after much cutting and measuring, she finished them. I shall never forget them, and I think yet you might be able to resurrect them from an old fashioned bureau in the attic of the old home, made wide, with a basement in them. The joy and pride I had when I first wore them shall never be forgotten, and on appearing on the street, the old boys got to saying things I did not understand about my pants, so I went to mother and said, "Mother, what is an heirloom?" and she said, "Something that has been handed down from your father, why do you ask me?" I said I wondered why the boys were calling my pants heirlooms. I ohpe, however, we may be always a pride and be welcomed to your City.

This is the Thirty-eighth anniversary of this Association. When we look at the condition of our Charitable Institutions and recall the deplorable management of our County Homes, and the still more inhuman treatment of the Insane, Idiotic, and Feeble-Minded throughout the State, you will applaud the movement of the organization of the Association of Directors of the Poor and Charities of Pennsylvania, and as we recount the many blessings to the afflicted, the direct result of this Association, and sum up the great reforms it has brought about, the almost transfiguration of our Charitable Institutions from what they once were, the wise and wholesome Legislation they advocated and were the means of having enacted, our hearts swell with pride, and sends the blood coursing through our veins mingling with joy and satisfaction over its great achievements, organized on the broad and divine principles of charity or love, and whose object was to carry out the direction of the Savior of mankind when he informed his Disciples, "That inasmuch as you did it unto the least of these, you did it unto me," gave them to drink, food to eat, and clothing to cover them. And in answering the Lawyer's question, when he said: "Master, what shall I do to inherit Eternal Life?" He said unto him, "What is written in the law? How readest thou?" The Lawyer answering said, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbor as thyeslf." The Master said unto him, "Thou hast answered right: This DO and thou shalt live." It is a comfort to those who have been engaged in the work, this Association has been doing, that it has met the Divine approval and the promise of Eternal Life.

Charity or love is the pole-star of life—the bright cynosure of the soul. All hearts to this haven are turned, as the compass hand swings to the pole.

Charity is the secret of winsomeness, and winsomeness is the secret of usefulness. It has therefore been recognized by the State as one of the most useful organizations in directing, advising and controlling its charities, as well as placing Pennsylvania in the foremost rank of any State in the Country for the care of her poor and unfortunate, and afflicted citizens. But I must not dwell on the virtues of the beloved Association, they are too well known to make it necessary for me to extol them.

This Association is Progressive in its work. We hear a great deal about Progression, especially at the present time, indeed it is required in this day of Limited trains that run at the rate of a mile a minute or more, of the telegraph, telephone, wireless telegraph, the aero and biplanes that skim through the air as fast and with the ease of a bird, invading the very precincts of heaven, and with all manners of devices in machinery to cheat labor, the quick and the dead, and if you are not quick you will be dead. We must be progressive. Progress has been defined by one of our known politicians like this, "It is the death of old ideas, and the birth of new ones," so this Association has been keeping in touch with this definition of progress, and I have no doubt that during the Convention many new progressive ideas will be given birth that will give new impetus to the management of our charities, and create a greater reformation and sensation than the "Bull Moosers."

A word to the Members: We have had the reputation of being not only a progressive organization, but a working one as well and as our program covers every phase of Charitable work, and is very full, let us strengthen that reputation for business, and stay until the business is transacted with neatness and dispatch. In this connection I am reminded of two Jews who lived in New York, Isaac Cohen and Benjamin Goldstein. (Relate story.)

So long as we talk business, that settles it, there will be no necessity to shoot or scoot.

I know the allurements of this beautiful City are very great, with her beautiful homes, nicely paved and clean streets, school, municipal and church buildings, as well as your magnificent institutions, which you have so loving and generously provided for the care of your afflicted citizens and orphan children.

But as we have been granted the freedom of the City by his Honor, the Mayor, and a decree made by the Honorable Judge Walling, exempting us from arrest; let us wait until after our program is exhausted and our business transacted, then we will paint the City red, if some one will be generous enough to furnish the paint. I trust, however, there will be no occasion for either and nothing but gratitude on our part for your hospitality extended to us.

I feel much honored by our President, Mr. Eshelman, in inviting me to respond to the Welcome to Erie. It is a great pleasure to come again to this City, as we remember the extremely pleasant visits we had here on three former occasions. Just twenty years ago today, this Association met in Convention in your City, at which time I had the honor of being its President, and thirty years ago, Somerset, my native home, lured this Association in Convention in your City to hold its next Convention there on the promise of plenty of buckwheat cakes and maple molasses. They got them.

The warmth of your greetings on this and former occasions is evidenced and appreciated by the splendid representation present, and coming as they do from all parts of our Commonwealth is itsself luminous proof of the spirit which has animated them in coming. Many of these present I know of a fact, are devoted benefactors of humanity. Some have journeyed a long distance to this Convention, not to seek their own interest, but to promote the up-lifting of their fellowmen.

We thank you for this splendid and cordial Welcome you have given us and the splendid representation present. It warms our hearts to look into the faces and grasp the hands of old friends, many of whom we first met and learned to know and love in your City many years ago. I trust our stay with you may be mutually pleasant and profitable.

Again in behalf of the members of this Convention I thank you.

President Eshelman: The Response on the part of the Ladies and Children's Aid Societies is by one who is well known throughout the State, in this work, and whose advice is often sought in the work, Mrs. Abbie Wilder, of Kennett Square, Pa.

ADDRESS OF MRS. ABBIE WILDER.

Mrs. Wilder was received with applause and addressed the Convention as follows:

Mr. President, Members of the Association, Ladies and Gentlemen: It is a sincere pleasure to meet and greet you all and I deem it an honor—yes, a true privilege to represent that useful, efficient organization "Children's Aid Society," and on the behalf of the Society accept the most cordial, kindly greeting extended.

This gracious welcome is but a token of the well known hospitality of this beautiful City and friendly people. These occasions teach new duties, infuse new life, an intellectual stimulus, a moral inspiration, a strengthening of character. Trust our presence may prove inspiring and be some assistance in solving the problems confronting this "Convention." We have one great theme "Charity." Encouragement along various lines will be the keynote of the meeting. There is no greater, grander, loftier work than helping poor, unfortunates to help themselves—stimulate their imagination, awaken and broaden their intelligence.

We have found Aid Society work—not a summer holiday or personally conducted tour through joyland—but work. In this effort for community uplift, there must be unity of purpose and co-operation in the building of these truer, nobler phases of life and success is assured. Then—"give to the world the best you have and the best will come back to you."

The President's Address was as follows, President Eshelman being received with applause as he rose to deliver it.

PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS

H. Frank Eshelman, Esq., of the Lancaster Bar, President.

The jail and the penitentiary are marks of an advanced civilization. The poor house and the asylum come among us hand in hand with schools and colleges.

The moil of humanity, like a hurricane—a tornado—leaves ruin and wreckage on every hand. They break down under burdens—they fall into pits—they become lost along the way-sides—they are smitten by plagues. But mankind, in its rapid flight across life's little valley, stoops to pick up, and stops to carry those who fail and fall in the race. Thus are we here today.

The American people, in their Federal Constitution, have ordained a government to "promote the general welfare" of themselves and their posterity. The States also, in their constitutions and laws, acknowledge and aim at the same purposes. The "original compact of society" includes an agreement that, each person by giving up his unlimited liberty and license and by yielding to the will of the whole, shall have in return such comfort and protection—such guaranties and assurances—such help and amelioration—such support against the shocks and accidents of life, as the whole, practically, guarantee and give.

It is not a matter of sentiment; but a matter of contract. Sentiment, frequently, spoils the plan of charities and reform work and of discipline and punishment. Our Supreme Court has said that, in its strictly legal status our public charities are more completely devoid of sentiment than almost any other of our public activities.

The phases of the general subject of public charities and corrections that require most attention are the prevention and restraint of the curse and the burden—the self help and contribution by the unfortunates, toward their own support—the new elements of the problem brought about by the changed family status resulting from child labor and cheap amusements, etc.—the problems arising from its falling off of marriages, that are permanent, and the rapid decline of the American birth rate in the face of greatly increased foreign immigration gradually changing the complexion and very texture of our people.

Prevention of insanity and pauperism in the most drastic form is urgent now, because of the tremendous proportions to which the problem has grown. At the present rate of increase, the cost will soon be greater than several of the ordinary functions of Government combined. It will soon be beyond the ability of the public to manage. Whatever is necessary to prevent absolutely, the weak-minded from procreating and bearing children, must be done. All curable defects in children, of nose and throat and eyes, and lungs which tend to handicap them as they grow and which medical men tell us tend to make them criminals and deficients, must be rigorously corrected. Perhaps to treat as criminal, all pauperism brought on by drink, would be deterrent upon those going into the first stages of such pauperism by their own wilful acts. The first stages of mental conditions that lead to insanity should be corrected at public charge in those who are without means. As drink produces a very great percentage of our pauperism and insanity, it should be made illegal to give or sell any liquor to those whose families are in need or who have an estate less than the statutory $300; and the poor and penal authorities should be required to prosecute all violations of such law, on information from the wife or children or brothers or sisters or other relative of such families.

In the great growth of child labor—in the world-wide spread of nickel and catch penny entertainments and amusements and in the hundreds of thousands of waifs, in the form of fatherless and motherless young children, resulting from the great increase of the divorce of young people—in all these modern orders of things, a great percentage of the children of our land become less components of families and concerns of parents, and more and more wards of the public. Therefore, a more thorough and effectual patroling by the Juvenile Court and its officers, is needed, to prevent these "children of the world" in their unguarded condition from going into evil ways.

Since a large percentage of our insanity comes from the outlying lonely sections, where life is monotonous, there should be some public cognizance of this with the right to order any change for cheerfulness of surroundings, whenever it can be done without burden to such families. That is, in the same way in which families are quarantined to prevent spread of physical disease—families should have public attention to correct those conditions which favor the progression of mental disorder. In families without means, where this condition exists, physicians should be empowered by the State to prescribe walks, and such variety in daily experiences as would reduce brooding to a minimum. The sound members of the family should be required to administer this prescribed treatment. That is the stage at which to take hold of this class of mental breakdown.

This indicates a form of the preventive measures that may be useful.

As to productiveness of our public wards and the contribution they should make to their own support, much is desired. I am convinced that this is a greatly neglected phase of the problem. Such surprising productiveness and such utilizing of by-products have been attained in all lines of creative activity in our modern times, in all cases where thorough study and attention have been given to this point, that, it is reasonably certain similar results would be achieved in our charities if serious thought were given to the case. I know it is like forcing production from worn out and broken and bad machinery. But the case is not the same. Because people are old does not argue they cannot do anything. In the business and professional world, men work till the end and die in the harness.

The thought I emphasize is that, if attention were directed upon this subject of self-support, in a serious way, as if it were the main object to be attained, we should be surprised at the results study and ingenuity would produce. I will not undertake to say what that production might be—whether food or clothing or repairs and up-keep of the establishment or articles to sell. I am simply making prominent the point that, serious study and experiment would show surprising results.

While these are two special phases of the problem which seem to the president to demand special attention, the program which we are about to carry out is so varied as to bring before this body all sides of the subject. The arrangement of a program so as to suit the entire convention and at the same time, give due prominence to the most serious demands of the public and of the wards of the state, is a tedious matter. Providing in a program for light and discussion upon new problems which arise very rapidly in our times; and securing persons (who are known authorities on these new problems) to discuss them, suggest remedies, etc., is a task requiring great ingenuity. For the able way in which these requirements of our association have been met in our program we all owe unstinted thanks to our efficient and urbane secretary. Our organization is very fortunate in having such an energetic motor to keep driving all its machinery in season and out of season, as he does.

We are now ready for the main business of this convention. Supplementing all the other addresses of welcome, I now welcome all to the proceedings upon which we are about to enter.

The Address of the President was received with applause.

Dr. Frank Woodbury, Secretary Committee on Lunacy was here introduced by President Eshelman, and addressed the Convention as follows, on the subject "State Control Over the Indigent Insane."

ADDRESS BY DR. FRANK WOODBURY.

Mr. President, Members of the Association, ladies and gentlemen: It gives me great pleasure to note, by the programme, that you have given the greater portion of the time of the present meeting to the consideration of the cause of the insane.

It is a great problem, and those who are engaged in trying to solve it need strong public opinion to support them in their work. There are some 17,000 known to be insane in the public institutions of Pennsylvania. There are nearly 2,000 feeble-minded and epileptic. These people are feeble in mind and not in condition to enjoy the blessings of life. The human machine is very complex, and it is not surprising that many are born into the world, defective. We approach this human scrap-heap of twenty thousand individuals to see if by any means we can restore some of that material to usefulness and to the enjoyment of life. During the revolutionary period and during the time of development and organization that followed, up to about the year, 1840, this State had not concerned itself with the insane. About that time rumors were circulated that this problem demanded a solution. A commission was appointed in the Legislature to examine into the problem, and they proposed building a hospital for the insane, by the State, to accommodate about 300 patients, and they selected a location in Philadelphia. That proposition dragged along for some time, and it was not until Miss Dorothy Dix came into Pennsylvania and made a tour through the alms houses and county jails, where the insane were kept, and with the data that she collected went to the Legislature, and they were so impressed by the data that she placed before them that they decided at once to build a hospital, and the first State lunatic hospital was ordered to be built, and opened its doors in 1851.

I will not dwell on the development of the different institutions that we now have, but merely state that since 1851 we have opened eight Hospitals for the care of the insane, and we have one for the criminal-insane that will be opened very soon. In those Hospitals, at the present time there are about 9,000 insane.

How are the rest of the insane cared for? This problem became acute about the year 1895, and the project was laid before the State Legislature to assist the Counties in baering this burden. That law, on account of the provisions, (which practically required that the Hospitals to be built should have skilled superintendents and trained nurses, etc.) did not become operative, because no one accepted its provisions; but in 1897 another law, with less stringent regulations, was passed, which was practically the adoption of the Wisconsin system of caring for the insane, by which the State should pay $1.50 a week for the care of each indigent insane person, and the County should bear the rest of the expense. That was afterward increased to $2 a week, and there are twenty-one Hospitals now operating under that system, in the various counties. The State cares for about 9,000 in the State hospitals, except that the Counties pay $1.75 a week for their indigent insane, the State paying whatever there is above that. The State is obliged to pay all above $1.75 a week, that is received from the Counties. In addition to that there are in the County Hospitals for the insane between seven and eight thousand that are cared for on the plan of the State paying $2 a week and the County paying whatever there may be over that.

As the President mentioned in his Address, the present methods of doing business throughout the world call for increased efficiency and more attention to detail, and it is well at this time to examine this question and see whether we have the best system that we can have.

The State has invested, in the present State Hospitals, over ten million dollars, in the Real Estate alone. At the last Session of the Legislature appropriations were made to the amount of $6,508,907.41, for the insane and feeble minded for the ensuing two years.

The time has come to examine this present system in Pennsylvania, which has grown up, and see how it will correspond with an ideal plan. It is defective in one respect, and that is in its method of supervision, superintendence and direction. The Committee on Lunacy was organized in 1893 by a Special Act passed largely on the English law. It was evident that it was not intended to give it any great amount of authority or power. It existed largely for the collection of statistics from the institutions, and for the purpose of instructing the institutions, and others, in the laws, and by inspection to use its influence to bring the institutions up to as high a standard as possible. The Committee feels satisfied that it has done its work in a manner that has been satisfactory. So it is a question, now, whether it would not be better to give the Committee more authority—with regard for instance, to the removal of patients from one Hospital to another, and in regard to the power to compel institutions to adopt a more uniform standard of treatment for the insane. While in many of the County Hospitals the standard of care is good, and nearly equal to the State Hospitals, yet in some it has been very difficult to bring it to the degree of care and efficiency necessary.

You are all aware that Ohio and Illinois and other States have adopted the entire State control of the insane. The question now is whether Pennsylvania has reached the period when the State should take up this matter entirely, and relieve the Counties of any part of the expense.

I am in favor of the County-care system, that is of having small hospitals distributed throughout the State for the care of the working insane and for those who are not homicidal or dangerous. I think those hospitals have done much good. I think they should be brought into closer relationship, however, with the State Hospitals.

A plan has occurred to me by which those hospitals should be made agricultural colonies or annexes of the State Hospital of their District, having Trustees appointed by the local courts, and on the Boards of their trustees they should have a Member of the State Hospital, from that county; so they could be made almost organically a part of the State Hospital system. That would facilitate the transfer of patients from the State to the County Hospitals, and would relieve the overcrowding in the State Hospitals of the old and the feeble and infirm who would be much better cared for in their own neighborhoods, where they could see their relatives and friends.

If we were to attempt to systematize the treatment in Pennsylvania the ideal plan, I think, would be to establish in the large general Hospitals psyschopathic wards for the inspection of all cases that are supposed to be insane, and when they are found to be insane they could be transferred to other institutions. In that way many persons who are suffering from drugs or alcolholism or some nervous strain would receive the first aid that they need and in a short time would be restored to their family, without ever having been committed to a Hospital for the insane. At the present time there is no place they can be transferred, except to hospitals for the insane.

At the last legislature we succeeded in getting a law passed to permit the large hospitals to establish such psychopathic wards, the patients to be treated in those hospitals to pay $2 per day. Put one Hospital, so far, has adopted that system, and that is the St. Joseph's Hospital in Pittsburg; but I hope as soon as the benefits of this law have become known and appreciated we shall have psychopathic wards in the large Hospitals all over the State.

The next step in a classification would be to have hospitals established for the treatment of insanity, for the restoration of all who are capable of being cured. Those Hospitals should have the acute and the recent cases, to treat. In Wisconsin all cases of insanity are sent to the State Hospitals.

In Pennsylvania a third class of Hospitals has been created which are properly small psychopathic hospitals, in the Counties. These Hospitals are equipped for the treatment of insanity, and should have the same privilege of treating the acute and the recent cases, as the larger Hospitals. Then we need more hospitals of the type of Wernersville, for the treatment of the chronic insane, where the cost for medical treatment would be small, as it is there. I believe in the hospitals that now complain of being so much overcrowded that they are not able to receive any acute cases, they have some 75 per cent of a class of patients who could be just as well treated in hospitals conducted at a lower rate for maintenance.

Then we need Hospitals, such as I have referred to; the small hospitals that are agricultural colonies.

Then we need hospitals for the epileptics. We need a Special Hospital for persons addicted to various drug habits who are now sent to the hospitals for the insane—as Judge Walling referred to this morning.

This would about cover the classification I would propose. We might have training-schools for feeble minded children, such as that at Polk and Spring City, and an Asylum for the old, who, it seems to me, are very improperly made to associate with the insane.

In looking back I can see that in the progress of the work we have been far behind, but I think at the present time we are on the road toward a much better method of classification of these classes of dependants, and a more efficient method of solving the problem.

(Applause)

Mr. Thomas (Erie)

I would like to ask Mr. Woodbury if they did not try the County-care system in New York State, and cease to continue it.

Mr. Woodbury: I think it was in 1907 they abolished the County-care system and the State took over all the Hospitals and put them under the care of the State.

Mr. Thomas: Are they not doing the same thing in Wisconsin?

Mr. Woodbury: By no means. That is quite different.

Mr. Thomas: Do you think it would be any saving? The State don't make any money in maintaining the insane at $3.75, does it?

Mr. Woodbury: It costs more than that.

Mr. Thomas: Do you think the County could care for those patients and give them proper care, at $4.25?

Mr. Woodbury: The experience in Wisconsin, for twenty-five years, is that the class of patients they send to the County Homes can be cared for at about one-half the expense, in the State Hospitals.

Mr. Thomas: It would be necessary that it should be under the supervision of some person who was well acquainted with insanity problems.

Mr. Woodbury: That was mentioned in my remarks.

Mr. Thomas: Do you think it is better for the insane to be near their relatives, where they can be visited once or twice a week?

Mr. Woodbury: In many cases it is. They get very lonely, some of them. One advantage of that is that the patient doesn't lose his individuality, as he does in a large hospital for the insane.

Mr. Thomas: We have been informed that frequent visitations make them worse.

Mr. Woodbury: That is entirely under the control of the Superintendent of the hospital. If he sees that it is doing a patient harm he naturally would restrict the number of visits; on the other hand there are many cases that are much benefitted by the visits.

Mr. L. C. Colborn moves that the President be authorized to make up the Committees, during the noon recess, and announce them at the opening of the afternoon Session.

The motion of Mr. Colborn is agreed to.

Upon motion the Convention here adjourned until two p. m.

A DELIGHTFUL AND PLEASANT SURPRISE.

W. H. Luden, Maker of Luden Menthol Cough Drops, Reading, Penn'a., gave to the Members of the Convention through L. C. Colborn the Secretary, a very pleasant surprise, by presenting to each of those present a box of his Menthol Cough Drops. To say they were greatly appreciated is putting it mildly. They were thoroughly enjoyed by all, and from actual observation, many can testify as to the quality and merits of the Cough Drops.

The Convention tendered a vote of thanks to W. H. Luden for the generous supply, and for his very appropriate gift of this occasion. A repetition will more than be accepted and appreciated.

The Secretary was directed to place this resolution in the minutes of the proceedings, and a copy be sent to Mr. W. H. Luden.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Pursuant to adjournment the Convention was called to order at two P. M. by President Eshelman.

The Chair announced the following Committees:

COMMITTEES.

AUDIT—James McRaub, Allegheny; J. A. Gray, Cambria; Frank A. Bausman, Lancaster.

PLACE OF MEETING—J. L. Brindle, Franklin; S. H. Boyd, Lancaster; W. D. Buchanan, Greene County; Edward D. Solenberger, Philadelphia, Pa.; D. A. Mackin, Luzerne; Chauncey Dickey, Somerset; Geo. H. Rifensbary, Luzerne; Mrs. J. H. McClean, Allegheny.

OFFICERS—Fred Fuller, Lackawanna; John L. Smith, Chester; J. L. Riley, Luzerne; Mrs. Sue Willard, Indiana; O. P. Babler, Philadelphia; John L. Black, Franklin; Mrs. E. S. Lindsey, Warren.

RESOLUTION—A. S. Miller, Pittsburg; J. S. Dugan, Fayette; N. B. Wilson, Lycoming; E. P. Gould, Erie; Dr. J. L. Sordes, Allegheny; A. P. Darr, Westmoreland; Geo. W. Crawford, Mercer; Mrs. Adrian W, McCoy, Meadville.

In the absence of Dr. Barr the topic "County Care of the Insane Under the Act of 1897" was taken up, and Mr. A. S. Miller of Allegheny addressed the Convention as follows:

COUNTY CARE OF THE INSANE.

Under the Act of 1897.

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen:

In making my initial bow before you as a member of this splendid organization, I wish to express the pleasure it gives me to meet so many well known and distinguished workers in the broad field of charities, as well as the great body of humble workers who are quietly doing such splendid work in the highways and byways of this great commonwealth.

I have been in the work only since January 1st last and have not had the pleasure of making the acquaintance of many of you, but I hope to have a much wider acquaintance with the members of this association before the close of this Convention.

I consider myself honored to be a member of an Association such as this, which has for its object the betterment of humanity, the alleviation of human suffering and distress, and the best methods of "ministering to the minds diseased."

We talk about the great problems to be solved in the world today, the best methods of government of great cities, the building of National highways and waterways, the conservation of water and the forces of nature, etc., but let me say that one of the mightiest problems to be faced in the world today is the conservation of human life and comfort, and the care of the mental defectives and indigent.

The subject assigned me is a very broad one and could be treated from so many angles, that it is difficult to know where to begin—or where to end.

The study of insanity and kindred diseases of the mind is one of the most important that can engage the mind of man. So long as there shall be poor and weak minded people to be cared for by public charity, so long will a place of refuge and a home for the worn out and feeble men and women be a necessity; and so long as the mind of man in this world of stress and strain becomes disordered and the sane become insane, and reason vacates the seat of judgment, so long will there be the necessity for an Asylum where the disordered in mind and the unfortunates who have fallen by the wayside in the struggle of life may be sheltered and cared for.

The problem of the Almshouse and the Insane Asylum is not merely one of economical administration, nor of human comfort and happiness; it is a part of the great social problem of poverty and insanity which confronts us, and any and all remedial institutions, organizations or methods which alleviate or prevent unnecessary pauperism or mental defection, should engage the thoughtful and serious attention of every one interested in the welfare of the human race.

The foundation of the laws pertaining to the insane and the first effort to alleviate insanity in a public way in Pennsylvania was created by an Act of Assembly passed in 1750. This Act sets out that "the saving and restoring of useful and laborious members of a Community is a work of public service." The Act then goes on to provide that "as in many parts of Pennsylvania there are languishing poor persons in disorder of mind, who have no skillful surgeons to cure them, that a hospital should be established for the relief of lunatics and other distempered persons."

In pursuance of this Act the Pennsylvania Hospital was established, it being the first of its kind in the State.

To show how the insane population of Pennsylvania has been gradually and steadily increasing, the records disclose the fact that at the end of 78 years from the founding of this Hospital the number of lunatics was only 887, but from that date (1828) to the present time, about 84 years, the number has grown to about 17,000. For the past few years the rate of increase has been an average of about 500 a year.

From the reports of those in charge of Insane Hospitals I gather that there are about 7,000 indigent insane in Pennsylvania now provided for in County Hospitals for the insane operated under the County Care Acts and under the supervision of the Committee on Lunacy, and I agree with Dr. Woodbury when he stated in an address before this Convention last year that "no where in the world are a similar number of the same class of dependent insane better housed, better clad or better treated, than those indigent insane in the County Hospital for the insane in Pennsylvania under the provisions of the present County Care Acts."

We have at the present time in Pennsylvania two system for the treatment of the insane—the State and the County care.

Prior to 1897 the State Asylums and Hospitals became so over crowded that it was not possible with the funds furnished by the State for those institutions to continue to take care of all the insane, so that in that year there was passed by the Legislature, Acts of Assembly, which are known as the "County Care Acts." There were in fact five spearate acts passed by the Legislature in 1897 relating to the care of the insane; two of these acts were approved the same day, to-wit, May 25th, 1897; one of these acts appropriated $200,000 to provide for the deficiency for the care and treatment of the insane as prescribed by previous Acts, the Acts of 1883, 1891 and 1895; the other Act approved by the Governor on the same day, and under which the Counties are acting, provides that "Any County, Municipality, Borough or Township of this Commonwealth, which now has, or may hereafter supply, erect and equip a suitable institution for the maintenance, care and treatment of the indigent insane, upon plans and specifications approved in writing by the Board of Public Charities, shall receive from the State Treasury the sum of $1.50 per week (since raised to $2.00 per week) for every indigent insane person of such County, who has been committed to such institution, etc., Provided, that the Board of Public Charities shall be satisfied that the quality and equipment of such institution and the manner of the care and treatment therein furnished is proper and suitable to the class of the indigent insane so maintained, and shall so certify to the Auditor General before any payment is made." The next Act was approved May 27th, 1889, and provides that upon the removal of indigent insane from their homes or from another hospital to a County Hospital, it shall be the duty of the overseers or Directors of the Poor to provide a female attendant unless the patient is accompanied by some member of her own family, and imposing a penalty of $250.00 if these provisions are not complied with. The next Act, approved June 22nd, 1897, provides for cases where any indigent insane has been committed to either a State or County Hospital and it afterwards develops that such persons had not a legal residence in Pennsylvania, that the State Board of Charities, upon notice being given them of these facts, should return such person to the State where he belongs. Then the last Act, which was passed in 1897, regarding the insane was approved July 22nd, 1897, and requires the Directors and Managers of Hospitals for the insane to make quarterly reports to the Auditor General of the number of indigent insane maintained, under penalty of fortfeiture of the whole amount due for the quarter, and also provides that all insane persons who apply to said Hospitals with proper papers and are willing and able to pay their expenses shall be admitted and provided with accommodations, etc.

It seems that the primary reason for the passage of the County Care Acts was to relieve the State Hospitals, but the further idea that the Legislators had in mind was that the County Hospitals must be manned and equipped to compare favorably with State Hospitals, and hence it follows that:

1st. They must first supply, erect and equip a suitable institution for the treatment of the insane.

2nd. This institution must be erected and equipped upon plans and specifications approved by the Board of public Charities.

3rd. This Hospital should do the same work that the State Hospitals are doing.

4th. The care and treatment of the inmates as well as the furnishing of the building must be subject to the approval of the State Board of Charities.

5th. The foregoing conditions being complied with, these institutions will receive from the State the sum of $2.00 per week for every indigent insane patient under their care.

6th. The Directors must provide a female attendant to accompany a female patient in transit unless she is accompanied by a member of her own family.

7th. These Acts imply that these institutions must be properly officered by a superintendent, who is a man versed in the treatment of nervous diseases, as well as otherwise fitted to fill the position.

8th. The Directors or officers of these County Hospitals must makes quarterly reports to the State Department or ferfeit the amount due for the quarter from the State, and also they must provide accommodations for all insane who are provided with proper papers.

I can say for the Allegheny County Hospital for the Insane, that it complies with all the conditions prescribed by the County Care Acts. Both the Chronic and the Acute Insane are treated as skillfully and with as large a percentage of success as obtains in any State Hospital in Pennsylvania or elsewhere, possibly because the institution is large enough to have and alienist of high rank as superintendent, with resident physicians and skilled attendants. I speak of the Allegheny County Hospital because it is a model institution and is as well if not better equipped than any County Hospital in the State.

The territory under the care of the Allegheny County Hospital embraces all the boroughs and townships of Allegheny County, including the City of McKeesport (the City of Pittsburg operates her own hospital.) We have now in this Hospital about 800 insane.

We also have a new Almshouse under the supervision of the same superintendent, completed last year at a cost of $550,000.00, which is one of the finest buildings of its kind in America. There is a population of about 400 inmates in the Almshouse. This, of course, is not operated under County Care Acts.

In conclusion I would sum up briefly what I consider the advantages of a well equipped County Hospital, operating under the County Care Acts, to-wit:

1st. It places the workable insane on farms which are in many cases almost self supporting and in some cases wholly so.

2nd. The largest County Hospitals will have not more than from 800 to 1,200 inmates, and all that are able to work can be given employment, whereas that would not be possible in State Hospitals having three or four times that number of inmates, with proportionately less acreage on which to employ them.

3rd. The County Hospital tends to prevent the overcrowding of State Hospitals by reason of the fact that otherwise thousands of patients would be sent there who are now cared for in local hospitals.

4th. The standard of treatment of the insane in local institutions throughout the State has been very much advanced since the County Care Acts went into operation fifteen years ago.

Since most, if not all, of them are now operating under the supervision of the Committee on Lunacy and the result is that no where in the Country are the dependent insane better cared for than those in the County Hospitals for the Insane in Pennsylvania acting under the present County Care Acts.

5th. There is a sentimental side to this subject, which to my mind is an argument in favor of County Hospitals for the Insane. It is said that the cost of maintenance per capita is greater in State Hospitals than in smaller ones, but whether that be true or not, it should not control the placing of these mental defectives.

We must not look at the mere outlay in dollars and cents of keeping these unfortunates while they stumble along the pathway of their darkened lives to the narrow house appointed for all. Dr. J. Lewis Srodes said in an address delivered before this Association three years ago "The human mind diseased is the human mind still, and the approach of insanity does not mark the appearance of a new entity or new force, the old entity or the old force simple goes astray," and I would add that sometimes not even all of the old entity goes astray. You all, who have made any observation or study of the insane, know that in the case of many who are adjudicated insane, that part of their minds to use the language of a layman, are as normal as ever. They have the same love for the old home, the same affection for wife or husband and children as they ever had, and the visits of these loved ones to them is the one ray of sunshine that gleams into the chaotic chamber of their darkened minds, and it would be impossible for them to receive these visits if they were confined in State Hospitals on account of the expense and distance.

In conclusion, may I say that as friends of the poor and the afflicted, the conservators of society and the guardians of the unfortunate in the uneven battle of life, let us welcome every suggestion and use every method and all the appliances at our command to aid the indigent, sooth the troubled in mind and help them as best we may to "husband out life's taper at the close." And let us thank God and take courage that we live in an age where we can see the transformation which has taken place in the methods of treatment of the insane since the early days in the world's history, when they were regarded as "possessed of devils" and were driven forth from the habitations of men to dwell among the fastnesses of the mountains or in dens and caves of the earth, far from human sympathy or help, until death mercifully came to their relief. It is a far cry from the days of moral darkness and the bigotry of the first century when the demon driven paralytic was cast forth from society and left to die uncared for and alone, to the glorious light of the civilization of the 20th Century where the Christian spirit of charity and altruism permeates every civilized nation of the world.

Bellevue, Pa. ANDREW S. MILLER.

Mr. Miller's paper was received with applause.

Hon. Francis Torrance, Pres. of Board of Public Charities, Pittsburg, was next introduced by President Eshelman, and was received with applause and addressed the Convention as follows, on the subject "The original intention of the law creating the County care of the insane."

Paper by HON. FRANCIS TORRANCE

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen:

Let me first thank you for the great privilege I feel and the honor it implies to be permitted to again address this Body, and particularly so on a subject which is of such vital import to those engaged in the cause here represented.

This being a representative Body of Directors of the Poor, the majority will be familiar with the causes or necessity that led to the passage of the Act of 1897, commonly called "County Care." The great Montesquieu in the introduction to his work "The Spirit of Laws" says: "Laws in their most generous signification are the necessary relations arising from the nature of things." Montesquieu gave this expression nearly two and a half centuries ago and yet how apt it is to the present discussion. This Act, like many others of great moment, was agitated for a good while before it met a successful reception and final passage at the hands of the Legislature of 1907.

To those familiar with the growth of insanity and familiar with the statistics of the insane population, a brief mention of the fact is all that is necessary and so I call your attention to the following interesting, and I hope impressive, figures; which figures, let me say, were compiled and used at the time we were urging the passage of the Act above referred to, and which is the subject before us now for discussion. I call particular attention to the regularity of the increases.

1884, 5,374—an increase of 36 over the previous year.
1885, 5,640—an increase of 266 over the previous year.
1886, 5,923—an increase of 283 over the previous year.
1887, 6,259—an increase of 336 over the previous year.
1888, 6,510—an increase of 251 over the previous year.
1889, 6,884—an increase of 374 over the previous year.
1890, 7,399—an increase of 515 over the previous year.
1891, 7,649—an increase of 250 over the previous year.
1892, 7,855—an increase of 206 over the previous year.
1893, 8,104—an increase of 249 over the previous year.
